THE PREFACE.

HOW unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my ſelf, to undertake a Work of this mixture; mine own reaſon, though exceeding weak, hath ſufficiently reſolved me. For had it been begotten then with my firſt dawn of Day, when the light of common Knowledge began to open it ſelf to my younger Years: and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted, that the darkneſs of Age and Death would have covered over both it and me, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the Hiſtory of the World; and laſtly purpoſed (ſome few ſallies excepted) to confine my diſcourſe, within this our renowned Iſland of Great Britain. I confeſs that it had better ſorted with my diſability, the better part of whoſe times are run out in other Travels; to have ſet together (as I could) the unjoynted and ſcattered frame of our Engliſh Affairs, than of the Univerſal: in whom had there been no other defect, (who am all defect) than the time of the Day, it were enough; the Day of a tempeſtuous life, drawn on to the very Evening ere I began. But thoſe inmoſt, and ſoul-piercing wounds, which are ever akeing while uncured: with the deſire to ſatisfie thoſe few Friends, which I have tried by the Fire of Adverſity; the former enforcing, the latter perſwading; have cauſed me to make my thoughts Legible, and my ſelf the Subject of every Opinion, wiſe or weak.

To the World I preſent them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have others that were, (Fortune changing) ſped much better in any Age. For, Proſperity and Adverſity have ever-more tied and untied vulgar Affections. And as we ſee it in experience, That Dogs do always bark at thoſe they know not; and that it is in their nature to accompany one another in thoſe clamours: ſo is it with the inconſiderate Multitude. Who, wanting that vertue which we call Honeſty in all Men, and that eſpecial Gift of GOD which we call Charity in Chriſtian Men; condemn, without hearing; and wound, without offence given: led thereunto by uncertain report only; which his Majeſty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all Lyes. Daemonolog. l. 3. c. 1.

Eccl. c. 11. v. 7.

Blame no Man (saith Siracides) before thou have inquired the matter: understand first, and then reform righteously. Rumor, res sine teste, sine judice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witness, without judge, malicious and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave S. Augustine Argument to affirm, That he feared the praise of good Men, and detested that of the evil. And herein no Man hath given a better rule, than this of Seneca, Conscientiæ satisfacimus: nihil in famam laboremus; sequatur vel mala, dum benè mereris. Let us satisfie our own Consciences, and not trouble our selves with fame: be it never so ill, it is to be despised so we deserve well.

Laudari à bonis timeo, & amari à malis detestor. Sen. de ira. l. 3. c. 11.

For my self, if I have in any thing served my Country, and prised it before my private: the general acceptation can yield me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair Sunshine Day to a Sea-man after Shipwrack; and the contrary, no other harm than an outragious Tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honour in the Dust; though further than the Defence of Her excellent Person, I never persecuted any Man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it: He that is the Supreme Judge of all the World, hath taken the account; so as for this kind of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, benè parta, delectat.

As for other Men; if there be any that have made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them: I can neither envy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine own mishap in that kind; but content my self to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars.

To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzie, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can travel the World without a Passport. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internal forms of the Mind, as there are external Figures of Men; there were then some possibility, to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, even Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying and extensive vertue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giving life which GOD hath cast upon Slime and Dust: as that among those that were, of whom we read and hear, and among those that are, whom we see and converse with; every one hath received a several Picture of Face, and every one a divers Picture of Mind; every one a form apart, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found so great diversity of Opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many natural and unnatural; wise, fooliſh; manly, and childish Affections and Passions in Mortal Men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of Plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference, of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the form internal.

And though it hath pleased GOD, to reserve the Art of reading Mens thoughts to himself: yet, as the Fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward works of Men (so far as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to guess at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to express the one by the other, very near the life: did not craft in many, fear in the most, and the Worlds love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compass it hath, to qualifie and mask over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam recidunt, quibus veritas non subest. No Man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour: the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their own Natures. Neither can any Man (saith Plutarch) ſo change himſelf, but that his Heart may be ſometimes ſeen at his Tongues end.

Plutarch

In this great diſcord and diſſimilitude of reaſonable Creatures, if we direct our ſelves to the Multitude; Omnis honeſtæ rei malus judex eſt vulgus, The common People are evil Judges of honeſt things, and whoſe Wiſdom (ſaith Eccleſiaſtes) is to be deſpiſed; if to the better ſort; every Underſtanding hath a peculiar Judgment, by which it both cenſureth other Men, and valueth it ſelf. And therefore unto me it will not ſeem ſtrange, though I find theſe my worthleſs Papers torn with Rats: ſeeing the ſlothful Cenſurers of all Ages, have not ſpared to tax the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the ſevereſt Men to themſelves, with Hypocriſie; the greateſt lovers of Juſtice, with Popularity; and thoſe of the trueſt Valour and Fortitude, with Vain-glory. But of theſe Natures, which lie in wait to find Fault, and to turn good into evil, ſeeing Solomon complained long ſince: and that the very Age of the World renders it every day after other more malicious; I muſt leave the Profeſſors to their eaſie ways of reprehenſion, than which there is nothing of more facility. Eccl. cap. 11. Nihil facilius, quam reprehendere alium.

To me it belongs in the firſt part of this Preface, following the common and approved Cuſtom of thoſe who have left the memories of time paſt to after Ages; to give, as near as I can, the ſame Right to Hiſtory which they have done. Yet ſeeing therein I ſhould but borrow other Mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the Repetition. True it is, that among many other Benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all humane Knowledge, that it hath given us Life in our Underſtanding, ſince the World it ſelf had Life and Beginning, even to this day: yea it hath triumphed over Time, which beſides it, nothing but Eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our Knowledge over the vaſt and devouring ſpace of ſo many thouſands of Years, and given ſo fair and piercing Eyes to our Mind; that we plainly behold living now, as if we had lived then, that great World, Magni Dei ſapiens opus, the wiſe Work (ſaith Hermes) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it ſelf. By it I ſay it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with Waters, and again re-peopled: How Kings and Kingdoms have flouriſhed and fallen; and for what Vertue and Piety GOD made proſperous; and for what Vice and Deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the leaſt Debt which we owe unto Hiſtory, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead Anceſtors; and, out of the depth and darkneſs of the Earth, delivered us their Memory and Fame. In a word, we may gather out of Hiſtory a Policy no leſs wiſe than eternal; by the compariſon and application of other Mens fore-paſſed Miſeries, with our own like Errours and ill deſervings.

But it is neither of Examples the moſt lively Inſtructions, nor the words of the wiſeſt Men, nor the terror of future Torments, that hath yet ſo wrought in our blind and ſtupified Minds; as to make us remember, That the infinite Eye and Wiſdom of GOD doth pierce through all our Pretences; as to make us remember, That the Juſtice of GOD doth require none other Accuſer, than our own Conſciences: which neither the falſe Beauty of our apparent Actions, nor all the Formality, which (to pacifie the Opinions of Men) we put on; can in any, or the leaſt kind, cover from his Knowledge. And ſo much did that Heathen Wiſdom confeſs, no way as yet qualified by the Knowledge of a true GOD. If any (ſaith Euripides) having in his Life committed wickedneſs, think he can hide it from the everlaſting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GOD's Judgments in particular, upon thoſe of all degrees, which have played with his Mercies; would require a Volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottom. The marks, ſet on private Men, are with their Bodies caſt into the Earth; and their Fortunes, written only in the memories of thoſe that lived with them: ſo as they who ſucceed, and have not ſeen the fall of others, do not fear their own faults. GOD's Judgments upon the greater and greateſt, have been left to Poſterity; firſt, by thoſe happy Hands which the Holy Ghoſt hath guided; and ſecondly, by their vertue, who have gathered the acts and ends of Men, mighty and remarkable in the World. Now to point far off, and to ſpeak of the converſion of Angels into Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greateſt and moſt glorious Kings, who have gnawn the Graſs of the Earth with Beaſts, for Pride and Ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wiſe working of Pharaoh, when he ſlew the Infants of Iſrael, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the Policy of Jezebel, in covering the Murder of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the Law: with many thouſands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopeleſs proof, that far-of examples would not be left to the ſame far-of reſpects, as heretofore? For who hath not obſerved, what labour, practice, peril, bloodſhed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the World have undergone, exerciſed, taken on them, and committed; to make themſelves and their iſſues Maſters of the World? And yet hath Babylon, Perſia, Ægypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the reſt, no Fruit, Flower, Graſs, nor Leaf, ſpringing upon the Face of the Earth, of thoſe Seeds: No; their very Roots and Ruins do hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta ſunt, vel manu hominum everruntur, vel ſtando & durando deficiunt. All that the Hand of Man can make, is either overturn'd by the Hand of Man, or at length by ſtanding and continuing conſumed. The reaſons of whoſe ruines, are diverſly given by thoſe that ground their Opinions on ſecond cauſes. All Kingdoms and States have fallen (ſay the Politicians) by outward and Foreign Force, or by inward negligence and diſſenſion, or by a third cauſe ariſing from both. Others obſerve, That the greateſt have ſunk down under their own weight; of which Livie hath a touch: eo crevit, ut magnitudine laboret ſua: Others, That the Divine Providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath ſet down the Date and Period of every Eſtate, before their firſt Foundation and Erection. But hereof I will give my ſelf a Day over to reſolve.

For ſeeing the firſt Books of the following Story, have undertaken the diſcourſe of the firſt Kings and Kingdoms: and that it is impoſſible for the ſhort life of a Preface, to travel after and overtake far-of Antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the preſent, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who having beheld, both in Divine and Humane Letters, the ſucceſs of Infidelity, Injuſtice, and Cruelty; have (notwithſtanding) planted after the ſame Pattern.

True it is that the Judgments of all Men are not agreeable; nor (which is more ſtrange) the Affection of any one Man ſtirred up alike with examples of like Nature: But every one is touched moſt, with that which moſt nearly ſeemeth to touch his own private; or otherwiſe beſt ſuteth with his apprehenſion. But the Judgments of GOD are for ever unchangeable; unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long proceſs of time, and won to give his Bleſſing in one Age, to that which he hath Curſed in another. Wherefore thoſe that are wiſe, or whoſe wiſdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to diſcern the bitter Fruits of irreligious policy, as well among thoſe examples that are found in Ages removed far from the preſent, as in thoſe of latter times. And that it may no leſs appear by evident proof, than by aſſeveration, That ill doing hath always been attended with ill ſucceſs; I will here, by way of Preface, run over ſome examples, which the work enſuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman Race, we have no ſooner paſſed over the violence of the Norman Conqueſt; than we encounter with a ſingular and moſt remarkable example of God's Juſtice, upon the Children of Henry the Firſt. For that King, when both by force, craft, and cruelty, he had diſpoſſeſt, over-reach'd, and laſtly made blind and deſtroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his own Sons Lords of this Land: GOD caſt them all, Male and Female, Nephews and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottom of the Sea, with above a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloved.

To paſs over the reſt, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certain, that after the Murder of that King, the iſſue of Blood then made, though it had ſome times of ſtay and ſtopping, did again break out; and that ſo often, and in ſuch abundance, as all our Princes of the Maſculine Race (very few excepted) died of the ſame Diſeaſe. And although the young Years of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than ſuſpicious: yet in that he afterwards cauſed his own Uncle the Earl of Kent to die, for no other offence than the deſire of his Brothers Redemption, whom the Earl as then ſuppoſed to be living; (the King making that to be Treaſon in his Uncle, which was indeed Treaſon in himſelf, had his Uncle's intelligence been true) this I ſay made it manifeſt, that he was not ignorant of what had paſt, nor greatly deſirous to have had it otherwiſe; though he cauſed Mortimer to die for the ſame.

This cruelty the ſecret and unſearchable Judgment of GOD revenged, on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and ſo it fell out, even to the laſt of that Line, that in the ſecond or third deſcent they were all buried under the ruines of thoſe Buildings, of which the Mortar had been tempered with innocent Blood. For Richard the Second, who ſaw, both his Treaſurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counſellors, ſome of them ſlaughtered by the People, others in his abſence executed by his Enemies; yet he always took himſelf for over-wiſe, to be taught by examples. The Earls of Huntington and Kent, Montague and Spencer, who thought themſelves as great Politicians in thoſe Days, as others have done in theſe: hoping to pleaſe the King, and to ſecure themſelves, by the Murder of Gloceſter; died ſoon after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent Hands; and far more ſhamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himſelf (who in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his Greatneſs, cannot be excuſed, as the diſavowing himſelf by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons, and Patents) he was in the Prime of his Youth depoſed; and murdered by his Couſen-german and Vaſſal, Henry of Lancaſter, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This

This King whoſe Title was weak, and his obtaining the Crown traiterous: who brake Faith with the Lords at his Landing, proteſting to intend only the recovery of his proper Inheritance; brake Faith with Richard himſelf; and brake Faith with all the Kingdom in Parliament, to whom he ſwore that the depoſed King ſhould live. After that he had enjoyed this Realm ſome few years, and in that time had been ſet upon on all ſides by his Subjects, and never free from Conſpiracies and Rebellions: he ſaw (if Souls immortal ſee and diſcern any things after the Bodies death) his Grandchild Henry the ſixth, and his Son the Prince, ſuddenly, and without mercy, murdered; the poſſeſſion of the Crown (for which he had cauſed ſo much Blood to be poured out) transferred from his Race; and by the Iſſues of his Enemies worn and enjoyed: Enemies, whom by his own Practice he ſuppoſed, that he had left no leſs powerleſs, than the Succeſſion of the Kingdom queſtionleſs; by Entailing the ſame upon his own Iſſues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane Reaſon could have judged no otherwiſe, but that theſe cautious Proviſions of the Father, ſeconded by the Valour and ſignal Victories of his Son Henry the fifth, had buried the hopes of every Competitor, under the deſpair of all Reconqueſt and Recovery. I ſay, that humane Reaſon might ſo have judged: were not this paſſage of Caſaubon alſo true, Dies, hora, momentum, evertendis dominationibus ſufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus eſſe fundatæ; A day, an hour, a moment, is enough to overturn the things, that ſeemed to have been founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the ſixth, upon whom the great ſtorm of his Grandfathers grievous Faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard the Grand-child of Edward: although he was generally eſteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince; yet as he refuſed the Daughter of Armaignac, of the Houſe of Navarre, the greateſt of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which Match he might have defended his Inheritance in France) and married the Daughter of Anjou, (by which he loſt all that he had in France) ſo as in condeſcending to the unworthy Death of his Uncle of Glouceſter, the main and ſtrong Pillar of the Houſe of Lancaſter; He drew on himſelf and this Kingdom the greateſt Joynt-loſs and Diſhonour, that ever it ſuſtained ſince the Norman Conqueſt. Of whom it may truly be ſaid, which a Counſellor of his own ſpake of Henry the Third of France, Q'uil eſtoit un fort gentil Prince; mais ſon reigne eſt advenu en une fort mauvois temps, That he was a very gentle Prince; but his Reign happened in a very unfortunate Seaſon.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolk were the Practiſers and Contrivers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolk, becauſe the Duke gave Inſtructions to their Authority, which otherwiſe under the Queen had been abſolute; the Queen, in reſpect of her perſonal wound, ſpretæque injuria formæ, becauſe Glouceſter diſſwaded her Marriage. But the Fruit was anſwerable to the Seed; the ſucceſs to the Counſel. For after the cutting down of Glouceſter, York grew up ſo faſt, as he dared to diſpute his Right, both by Arguments and Arms; in which Quarrel, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greateſt number of their Adherents, were diſſolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleaſed God to ſtrike down York: yet his Son the Earl of March, following the plain Path which his Father had troden out, deſpoyled Henry the Father, and Edward, the Son, both of their Lives and Kingdoms. And what was the end now of that politick Lady the Queen, other than this, That ſhe lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that ſhe lived to look on, while her Husband the King, and her only Son the Prince, were hewen in ſunder; while the Crown was ſet on his Head that did it. She lived to ſee her ſelf deſpoiled of her Eſtate, and of her Moveables: and laſtly, her Father, by rendring up to the Crown of France, the Earldom of Provence and other places, for the payment of Fifty thouſand Crowns for her Ranſom, to become a ſtark Beggar. And this was the end of that ſubtilty, which Siracides calleth fine, but unrighteous: for other Fruit hath it never yielded ſince the World was. Sirac. c. 19.

And now came it to Edward the Fourth's turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the Plants of Lancaſter were rooted up; one only Earl of Richmond excepted: whom alſo he had once bought of the Duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward ſuch a Plantation, as could any way promiſe it ſelf ſtability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the ſlaughter, which Gloceſter, Dorſet, Haſtings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his own preſence: of which tragical Actors, there was not one that eſcaped the Judgment of GOD in the ſame kind. And he, which (beſides the execution of his Brother of Clarence, for none other offence than he himſelf had formed in his own imagination) inſtructed Gloceſter to kill Henry the Sixth, his Predeceſſor; taught him alſo by the ſame art to kill his own Sons and Succeſſors Edward and Richard. For thoſe Kings, which have ſold the Blood of others at a low Rate; have but made the Market for their own Enemies, to buy of theirs at the ſame Price.

To Edward the Fourth ſucceeded Richard the Third, the greateſt Maſter in miſchief of all that fore-went him: who although, for the neceſſity of his Tragedy, he had more Parts to play, and more to perform in his own Perſon, than all the reſt; yet he ſo well fitted every affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his own intereſt. For he wrought ſo cunningly upon the affections of Haſtings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queen and to all her Kindred: as he eaſily allured them to condeſcend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternal Uncle and half Brother, ſhould (for the firſt) be ſevered from him: ſecondly, he wrought their conſent to have them impriſoned: and laſtly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their Heads ſevered from their Bodies. And having now brought thoſe his chief Inſtruments to exerciſe that common Precept, which the Devil hath written on every Poſt; namely, To depreſs thoſe whom they had grieved, and to deſtroy thoſe whom they had depreſt; He urged that Argument ſo far and ſo forcibly, as nothing but the Death of the young King himſelf, and of his Brother, could faſhion the concluſion. For he cauſed it to be hammered into Buckingham's Head, That, whenſoever the King, or his Brother, ſhould have able years to exerciſe their power; they would take a moſt ſevere revenge of that cureleſs wrong, offered to their Uncle and Brother, Rivers and Grey. Scelera ſceleribus tuenda. Sen. de clem.

But this was not his manner of reaſoning with Haſtings, whoſe fidelity to his Maſters Sons was without ſuſpect: and yet the Devil, who never diſſwades by impoſſibility, taught him to try him. And ſo he did. But when he found by Catesby, who ſounded him, that he was not fordable; he firſt reſolved to kill him ſitting in Council: wherein having failed with his Sword; he ſet the Hangman upon him, with a Weapon of more weight. And becauſe nothing elſe could move his Appetite, he cauſed his Head to be ſtricken off, before he eat his Dinner. A greater Judgment of GOD, than this this upon Haſtings, I have never obſerved in any Story. For the ſelf-ſame Day that the Earl Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without trial of Law, or offence given) by Haſtings advice executed at Pomfret: I ſay Haſtings himſelf in the ſame Day and (as I take it) in the ſame Hour, in the ſame lawleſs manner had his Head ſtricken off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an Eloquent Oration perſwaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their King. And having received the Earldom of Hereford for reward, beſides the high hope of marrying his Daughter to the Kings only Son; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his truſtieſt Servant; he had his Head ſevered from his Body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what ſucceſs had Richard himſelf after all theſe Miſchiefs and Murders, Policies and Counter-policies to Chriſtian Religion: and after ſuch time, as with a moſt mercileſs Hand he had preſſed out the breath of his Nephews and Natural Lords; other than the proſperity of ſo ſhort a life, as it took end, ere himſelf could well look over and diſcern it? The great outcry of innocent Blood, obtaining at GOD's Hands the effuſion of his; who became a ſpectacle of ſhame and diſhonour, both to his Friends and Enemies.

This cruel King, Henry the Seventh cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate Inſtrument of GOD's Juſtice. A politick Prince he was, if ever there were any, and who by the Engine of his Wiſdom, beat down and overturned as many ſtrong oppoſitions both before and after he ware the Crown as ever King of England did: I ſay by his Wiſdom, becauſe as he ever left the reins of his Affections in the hands of his Profit, ſo he always weighed his Undertakings by his Abilities, leaving nothing more to hazzard than ſo much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well obſerved the proceedings of Loys the Eleventh, whom he followed in all that was Royal or Royal-like, but he was far more juſt, and begun not their Proceſſes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never indure any mediation in rewarding his Servants, and therein exceeding wiſe; for whatſoever himſelf gave, he himſelf received back the thanks and the love, knowing it well that the affections of Men (purchaſed by nothing ſo readily as by benefits) were Trains that better became great Kings, than great Subjects. On the contrary, in whatſoever he grieved his Subjects, he wiſely put it off on thoſe, that he found fit Miniſters for ſuch actions. Howſoever, the taking off, of Stanley's Head, who ſet the Crown on his, and the Death of the young Earl of Warwick, Son to George D. of Clarence, ſhews, as the ſucceſs alſo did, that he held ſomewhat of the Errors of his Anceſtors, for his poſſeſſion in the firſt Line ended in his Grand-children, as that of Edward the Third and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the Eight: if all the Pictures and Patterns of a mercileſs Prince were loſt in the World, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the Story of this King. For how many Servants did he advance in haſte (but for what vertue no Man could ſuſpect) and with the change of his fancy ruined again; no Man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more deſert gave he abundant Flowers, from whence to gather Hony, and in the end of Harveſt burnt them in the Hive? How many Wives did he cut off, and caſt off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the Blood (whereof ſome of them for Age could hardly crawl towards the Block) with a world of others of all Degrees

(of whom our common Chronicles have kept the account) did he Execute? Yea, in his very death Bed, and when he was at the point to have given his account to GOD for the abundance of Blood already ſpilt: he imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father; and executed the Earl of Surrey the Son; the one, whoſe deſervings he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, and the Kings ſervice; the other, never having committed any thing worthy of his leaſt diſpleaſure: the one exceeding valiant and adviſed, the other, no leſs valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But beſides the ſorrows which he heaped upon the Fatherleſs, and Widows at home: and beſides the vain enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he conſumed more Treaſure, than all our victorious Kings did in their ſeveral Conqueſts: what cauſeleſs and cruel Wars did he make upon his own Nephew King James the fifth? What Laws and Wills did he deviſe, to eſtabliſh this Kingdom in his own iſſues? uſing his ſharpeſt Weapons to cut off, and cut down thoſe Branches, which ſprang from the ſame Root that himſelf did. And in the end (notwithſtanding theſe his ſo many irreligious proviſions) it pleaſed GOD to take away all his own, without increaſe; though, for themſelves in their ſeveral kinds, all Princes of eminent vertue. For theſe words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy Sword hath made other Women childleſs: ſo ſhall thy Mother be childleſs among other Women. And that Blood, which the ſame King Henry affirmed, that the cold Air of Scotland had frozen up in the North, GOD hath diffuſed by the Sunſhine of his Grace: from whence His Majeſty now living, and long to live, is deſcended. Of whom I may ſay it truly, That if all the malice of the World were infuſed into one Eye: yet could it not diſcern in His life, even to this day, any one of thoſe foul ſpots, by which the Conſciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent Blood on the Sword of his Juſtice, with which the moſt that forewent him, have ſtained both their hands and fame. And for this Crown of England; it may truly be avowed, That he hath received it even from the hand of GOD, and hath ſtayed the time of putting it on, howſoever he were provoked to haſten it: That He never took revenge of any Man, that ſought to put him beſide it: That He refuſed the aſſiſtance of Her Enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Princeſs did: That His Majeſty entred not by a breach, nor by Blood; but by the ordinary Gate, which his own right ſet open; and into which, by a general love and obedience, He was received. And howſoever His Majeſties preceding Title to this Kingdom, was preferred by many Princes (witneſs the Treaty at Cambray in the Year 1559) yet he never pleaſed to diſpute it, during the life of that renowned Lady, his Predeceſſor; no, notwithſtanding the injury of not being declared Heir, in all the time of Her long Reign.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulneſs to GOD for the uniting of the Northern parts of Britany to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which though they were ſevered but by ſmall Brooks and Banks, yet by reaſon of the long continued War, and the cruelties exerciſed upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely ſevered. This I ſay is not the leaſt of God's Bleſſings which His Majeſty hath brought with him unto this Land: No, put all our petty grievances together, and heap them up to their height, they will appear but as a Mole-hill, compared with the Mountain of this Concord. And if all the Hiſtorians ſince then, have acknowledged the uniting of the red Roſe, and the white, for the greateſt happineſs, (Chriſtian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdom received from GOD, certainly the Peace between the two Lions of Gold and Gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, beſides the ſparing of our Britiſh Blood, heretofore and during the difference ſo often and abundantly ſhed, the State of England is more aſſured, the Kingdom more inabled to recover her ancient Honour and Rights, and by it made more invincible than by all our former Alliances, Practices, Policies and Conqueſts. It is true that hereof we do not yet find the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the Year 1588, joyned the Army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the South-Coaſt; and had his Majeſty at the ſame time declared himſelf againſt us in the North: it is eaſie to Divine what had become of the Liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur have bought this Union at a far greater price than it hath ſince coſt us.

It is true, that there was never any Common-weal or Kingdom in the World, wherein no Man had cauſe to lament. Kings live in the World and not above it. They are not infinite to examine every Man's cauſe, or to relieve every Man's wants. And yet, in the latter, (though to his own prejudice) His Majeſty hath had more compaſſion of other Men's neceſſities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be ſaid, as of Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem Cordis: which if other Men do not underſtand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better ſpoken of His Majeſty, than of any King that ever England had; who as well in Divine, as Humane underſtanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

Pin. Comment. in Sal. 1 K. 4.

I could ſay much more of the Kings Majeſty, without flattery: did I not fear the imputation of preſumption, and withal ſuſpect, that it might befal theſe Papers of mine, (though the loſs were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by unskilful and common Painters; which by her own Commandment, were knockt in pieces and caſt into the Fire. For ill Artiſts, in ſetting out the beauty of the external: and weak Writers, in deſcribing the vertues of the internal; do often leave to Poſterity, of well-formed Faces a deformed memory; and of the moſt perfect and Princely minds, a moſt defective repreſentation. It may ſuffice, and there needs no other diſcourſe, if the honeſt Reader but compare the cruel and turbulent paſſages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour Princes (of whom for that purpoſe I have inſerted this brief diſcourſe) with His Majeſties temperate, revengeleſs, and liberal diſpoſition: I ſay, that if the honeſt Reader weigh them juſtly, and with an even hand: and withal, but beſtow every deformed Child on his true Parent; he ſhall find, that there is no Man which hath ſo juſt cauſe to complain, as the King himſelf hath.

Now as we have told the ſucceſs of the trumperies and cruelties of our own Kings, and other great Perſonages, ſo we find, that GOD is every where the ſame GOD. And as it pleaſed him to puniſh the uſurpation, and unnatural cruelty of Henry the Firſt, and of our Third Edward, in their Children for many Generations: ſo dealt he with the Sons of Loys Debonaire, the Son of Charles the Great, or Charlemain. For after ſuch time as Debonaire of France, had torn out the Eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the Son of Pepin, the eldeſt Son of Charlemain, and Heir of the Empire, and then cauſed him to die in Priſon, as did our Henry to Robert his elder Brother: there followed nothing but Murders upon Murders, Poyſonings, Impriſonments, and civil War; till the whole Race of that famous Emperour was extinguiſhed.

And

And though Debonaire, after he had rid himſelf of his Nephew by a violent death; and of his Baſtard Brothers by a civil death (having incloſed them with ſure Guard, all the days of their Lives, within a Monaſtery) held himſelf ſecure from all oppoſition: Yet GOD raiſed up againſt him (which he ſuſpected not) his own Sons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him Priſoner, and to depoſe him; his own Sons, with whom (to ſatisfie their Ambition) he had ſhared his Eſtate, and given them Crowns to wear, Kingdoms to govern, during his own Life. Yea his eldeſt Son Lothaire (for he had four, three by his firſt Wife, and one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cauſe of his Depoſition, That he had uſed violence towards his Brothers and Kinſmen; and that he had ſuffered his Nephew (whom he might have delivered) to be ſlain, eo quod, ſaith the Text, fratribus & propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiſerit. Becauſe he uſed violence to his Brothers and Kinſmen, and ſuffered his Nephew to be ſlain whom he might have delivered. Step. Paſquiere recher. l. 5. c. 1.

Yet did he that which few Kings do; namely, repent him of his Cruelty. For among many other things, which he performed in the General Aſſembly of the States, it follows, Poſt hæc autem palam ſe erraſſe confeſſus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodoſii exemplum, pœnitentiam ſpontaneam ſuſcepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem geſſerat. After this he did openly confeſs himſelf to have erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodoſius, he under-went voluntary Penance as well for his other Offences, as for that which he had done againſt Bernard his own Nephew. Paſq. Ibidem.

This he did: and it was Praiſe-worthy. But the Blood that is unjuſtly ſpilt, is not again gathered up from the ground by Repentance. Theſe Medicines, miniſtred to the dead, have but dead Rewards.

This King, as I have ſaid, had four Sons. To Lothaire his eldeſt he gave the Kingdom of Italy; as Charlemain, his Father, had done to Pepin the Father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire. To Pepin the ſecond Son he gave the Kingdom of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdom of Bavier: and to Charles, whom he had by a ſecond Wife, called Judith, the Remainder of the Kingdom of France. But this ſecond Wife, being a Mother-in-law to the reſt, perſwaded Debonaire to caſt his Son Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles: which, after the death of his Son Pepin, he proſecuted to effect, againſt his Grand-child bearing the ſame Name. In the mean while, being invaded by his Son Loys of Bavier, he dies for Grief.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bavier, and Charles afterwards called the Bald, and their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, joyn in League againſt the Emperour Lothaire their eldeſt Brother. They fight near to Auxerre the moſt bloody Battel that ever was ſtrucken in France: in which, the marvellous loſs of Nobility, and Men of War, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Hunnes, to fall upon Almain; and the Danes, to entet upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by Treaſon ſeizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyſter, Carloman rebels againſt his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burns out the Eyes of his Son Carloman; Bavier invades the Emperour Lothaire his Brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, He is aſſailed and wounded to the Heart by his own Conſcience, for his Rebellion againſt his Father and for his other Cruelties, and dies in a Monaſtery. Charles the Bald the Uncle oppreſſeth his Nephews the Sons of Lothaire, he uſurpeth the Empire to the prejudice of Loys of Bavier his elder Brother, Bavier's Armies and his Son Carloman are beaten, he dies of Grief, and the Uſurper Charles is poiſoned by Zedekias a Jew his Phyſician, his Son Loys le Beque dies of the ſame Drink.

Beque had Charles the ſimple, and two Baſtards, Loys and Carloman; they rebel againſt their Brother, but the eldeſt breaks his Neck, the younger is ſlain by a wild Boar; the Son of Bavier had the ſame ill Deſtiny and brake his Neck by a Fall out of a Window in ſporting with his Companions. Charles the groſs becomes Lord of all that the Sons of Debonaire held in Germany, wherewith not contented, he invades Charles the ſimple, but being forſaken of his Nobility, of his Wife, and of his Underſtanding, he dies a diſtracted Begger. Charles the ſimple is held in Wardſhip by Eudes Major of the Palace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes, and laſtly being taken by the Earl of Vermandois, he is forced to die in the Priſon of Peron: Loys the Son of Charles the ſimple breaks his Neck in chaſing a Wolf, and of the two Sons of this Loys, the one dies of Poyſon, the other in the Priſon of Orleans, after whom Hugh Capet of another Race, and a ſtranger to the French, makes himſelf King.

Theſe miſerable ends had the iſſues of Debonaire: who after he had once apparelled Injuſtice with Authority, his Sons and Succeſſors took up the Faſhion; and wore that Garment ſo long without other Proviſions, as when the ſame was torn from their ſhoulders, every Man deſpiſed them as miſerable and naked Beggers. The wretched ſucceſs they had, (ſaith a learned French-man) ſhews, què en ceſte mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la juſticè: That in the death of that Prince, to wit of Bernard the Son of Pepin, the true Heir of Charlemaine, Men had more medling, than either GOD, or Juſtice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certain that Francis the firſt, one of the worthieſt Kings (except for that Fact) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himſelf; after he had commended the deſtruction of the Proteſtants of Mirandol and Cabrieres, to the Parliament of Provence, which poor People were thereupon burnt, and murdered; Men, Women, and Children. It is true, that the ſaid King Francis repented himſelf of the Fact, and gave Charge to Henry his Son, to do Juſtice upon the Murderers; threatning his Son with GOD's Judgments, if he neglected it. But this unſeaſonable Care of his, GOD was not pleaſed to accept for Payment. For after Henry himſelf was ſlain in Sport by Montgomery, We all may remember what became of his four Sons, Francis, Charles, Henry and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautiful and vertuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, caſt out of the World, without Stock or Seed. And notwithſtanding their ſubtilty, and breach of Faith; with all their Maſſacres, upon thoſe of the Religion, and great effuſion of Blood; the Crown was ſet upon his Head, whom they all laboured to diſſolve; the Proteſtants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more ſtrong Cities than ever they had.

Let us now ſee if GOD be not the ſame GOD in Spain, as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no further back than to Don Pedro of Caſtile: in reſpect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicil, our Richard the third, and the great Evan Vaſilowich of Muſcovia, were but petty ones: this Caſtilian, of all Chriſtian and Heathen Kings, having been the moſt mercileſs. For beſides thoſe of his own Blood and Nobility which he cauſed to be ſlain in his own Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis the great Maſter of Calatrava, Ruis Gonſales, Alphonſo Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom he cut in pieces and caſt into the Streets, denying him Chriſtian Burial: I ſay beſides theſe, and the Slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonſo Gomes, and the great Commander of Caſtile; ſtile; He made away the two Infants of Arragon his Couſin-germans, his Brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquerques, Nugnes de Guzman, Comel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Guttiere his great Treaſurer, and all his Kindred; and a world of others. Neither did he ſpare his two youngeſt Brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in cloſe Priſon from their Cradles, till one of them had lived ſixteen years, and the other, fourteen; he murdered them there. Nay he ſpared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Laſtly as he cauſed the Arch-Biſhop of Toledo, and the Dean, to be killed of Purpoſe to enjoy their Treaſures: ſo did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with ſeven and thirty of his Nobility; that came unto him for Succour, with a great Summ of Money, to levy (by his Favour) ſome Companies of Souldiers to return withall. Yea he would needs aſſiſt the Hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old King; in ſo much as Pope Urban declared him an Enemy both to GOD and Man. But what was his End? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdom, and re-eſtabliſhed by the Valour of the Engliſh Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaſter: He was ſtabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earl of Aſtramara, who diſpoſſeſt all his Children of their Inheritance; which, but for the Father's Injuſtice and Cruelty, had never been in danger of any ſuch thing. Hiſt. of Spain.

If we can parallel any Man with this King, it muſt be Duke John of Burgoigne: who, after his traiterous murder of the Duke of Orleans, cauſed the Conſtable of Armagnac, the Chancelour of France, the Biſhops of Conſtance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and Reverend Church-men, the Earl of gran Prè Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of Juſtice, of the Chamber of Accompts, Treaſury and Requeſt, (with ſixteen hundred others to accompany them) to be ſuddenly and violently ſlain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have maſtered France: He was ſoon after ſtrucken with an Axe in the Face, in the preſence of the Dauphin; and, without any leiſure to repent his miſdeeds, preſently ſlain. Theſe were the Lovers of other Mens miſeries: and Miſery found them out. French Invent. in Anno 1418.

Now for the Kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry the ſeventh, Henry the eighth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the firſt: and the firſt that laid the Foundation of the preſent Auſtrian greatneſs. For this King did not content himſelf to hold Arragon by the Uſurpation of his Anceſtor; and to faſten thereunto the Kingdom of Caſtile and Leon, which Iſabel his Wife held by ſtrong hand, and his aſſiſtance, from her own Niece the Daughter of the laſt Henry: but moſt cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of Right; He alſo caſt his own Niece out of the Kingdom of Navarre; and, contrary to Faith, and the Promiſe that he made to reſtore it, fortified the beſt Places, and ſo waſted the reſt, as there was no means left for any Army to invade it. This King I ſay, that betrayed alſo Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his own Blood, and by double Alliance tied unto him; ſold them unto the French: and with the ſame Army, ſent for their Succour under Gonſalvo, caſt them out; and ſhared their Kingdom with the French, whom afterwards he moſt ſhamefully betrayed.

This wiſe and politick King, who ſold Heaven and his own Honour, to make his Son, the Prince of Spain, the greateſt Monarch of the World: ſaw him die in the flower of his years; and his Wife great with Child, with her untimely Birth, at once and together buried. His eldeſt Daughter married unto Don Alphonſo Prince of Portugal, beheld her firſt Husband break his Neck in her preſence; and being with Child by her ſecond, died with it. A juſt Judgment of GOD upon the Race of John, Father to Alphonſo, now wholly extinguiſhed: who had not only left many diſconſolate Mothers in Portugal, by the ſlaughter of their Children; but had formerly ſlain, with his own Hand, the Son and only comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutcheſs of Viſeo. The ſecond Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned Fool, and died mad and deprived. His third Daughter, beſtowed on King Henry the Eighth, he ſaw caſt off by the King: the Mother of many troubles in England; and the Mother of a Daughter that in her unhappy zeal ſhed a world of innocent Blood; loſt Callice to the French; and died heart-broken without increaſe. To conclude, all thoſe Kingdoms of Ferdinand have Maſters of a new name; and, by a ſtrange Family are governed and poſſeſt.

Charles the Fifth, Son to the Arch-duke Philip, in whoſe vain enterpriſes upon the French, upon the Almans, and other Princes and States, ſo many Multitudes of Chriſtian Soldiers, and renowned Captains, were conſumed: who gave the while a moſt perilous entrance to the Turks, and ſuffered Rhodes, the Key of Chriſtendom, to be taken; was in concluſion chaced out of France, and in a ſort out of Germany; and left to the French, Metz, Toul, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire; ſtole away from Inſpurg; and ſcaled the Alpes by Torch-light, purſued by Duke Maurice; having hoped to ſwallow up all thoſe Dominions, wherein he concocted nothing ſave his own diſgraces. And having, after the ſlaughter of ſo many Millions of Men, no one Foot of Ground in either: He crept into a Cloyſter, and made himſelf a Penſioner of an Hundred thouſand Duckets by the Year to his Son Philip; from whom he very ſlowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance.

Nether. Hiſt. l. 7. fol. 313.

His Son again, King Philip the Second, not ſatisfied to hold Holland and Zeland (wreſted by his Anceſtors from Jaqueline their lawful Princeſs) and to poſſeſs in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands: perſwaded by that miſchievous Cardinal of Granvil, and other Romiſh Tyrants; not only forgot the moſt remarkable ſervices, done to his Father the Emperor by the Nobility of thoſe Countries; not only forgot the Preſent, made him upon his entry, of Forty Millions of Florens, called the Noval aid; nor only forgot, that he had twice moſt ſolemnly ſworn to the General States, to maintain and preſerve their Ancient Rights, Priviledges, and Cuſtoms, which they had enjoyed under their thirty and five Earls before him, conditional Princes of thoſe Provinces: but beginning firſt to conſtrain them, and enthral them by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, and then to impoveriſh them by many new deviſed and intolerable Impoſitions; He laſtly, by ſtrong hand and main force, attempted to make himſelf not only an abſolute Monarch over them, like unto the Kings and Sovereigns of England and France; but Turk-like, to tread under his Feet all their National and Fundamental Laws, Priviledges, and Ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had eaſily obtained from the Pope a Diſpenſation of his former Oaths (which Diſpenſation was the true cauſe of all the War and bloodſhed ſince then) and after he had tried what he could perform, by dividing of their own Nobility, under the Government of his baſe Siſter Margaret of Auſtria, and the Cardinal Granvil; He employed that moſt mercileſs Spaniard Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo Duke of Alva, followed with a powerful Army of ſtrange Nations: by whom he firſt ſlaughtered that renowned Captain the Earl of Egmont, Prince of Gavare; and Philip Montmorency Earl of Horn: made away Montigue, and the Marquis of Bergues; and cut off in thoſe ſix Years

(that Alva governed) of Gentlemen and others, eighteen thouſand and ſix hundred, by the Hands of the Hangman, beſides all his other barbarous Murders and Maſſacres. By whoſe miniſtery when he could not yet bring his affairs to their wiſhed ends, having it in his hope to work that by ſubtlety, which he had failed to perform by force: He ſent for Governor his Baſtard Brother Don John of Auſtria; a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to thoſe People. But he, uſing the ſame Papal advantage that his Predeceſſors had done; made no ſcruple to take Oath upon the Holy Evangeliſts, to obſerve the Treaty made with the general States; and to diſcharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, and other Strangers, therein gariſoned. Towards whoſe Pay and Paſport, the Netherlands ſtrained themſelves to make payment of ſix hundred thouſand pounds. Which Monies received, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed the Citadels of Antwerp and Nemeures: not doubting (being unſuſpected by the States) to have poſſeſt himſelf of all the maſtering places of thoſe Provinces. For whatſoever he overtly pretended, He held in ſecret a contrary Council with the Secretary Eſcovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, Miniſters of the Spaniſh Tyranny; formerly practiſed, and now again intended. But let us now ſee the effect and end of this Perjury, and of all other the Dukes Cruelties. Firſt for himſelf, after he had murdered ſo many of the Nobility; executed (as aforeſaid) Eighteen thouſand ſix hundred in ſix years; and moſt cruelly ſlain Man, Woman, and Child, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden, and other places: and after he had conſumed ſix and thirty Millions of Treaſure in ſix Years: notwithſtanding his Spaniſh vaunt, That he would ſuffocate the Hollanders in their own Butter-barrels, and Milk-tubs: He departed the Country no otherwiſe accompanied, than with the Curſe and Deteſtation of the whole Nation; leaving his Maſters Affairs in a tenfold worſe Eſtate, than he found them at his firſt arrival. For Don John, whoſe haughty conceit of himſelf overcame the greateſt difficulties; though his Judgment were over weak to manage the leaſt: what wonders did his fearful breach of Faith bring forth, other than the King his Brothers jealouſie and diſtruſt; with the untimely death that ſeized him, even in the flower of his youth. And for Eſcovedo his ſharp-witted Secretary, who in his own imagination had conquered for his Maſter both England and the Netherlands; being ſent into Spain upon ſome new project, He was at the firſt arrival, and before any acceſs to the King, by certain Ruffians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own Lodging. Laſtly, if we conſider the King of Spain's Carriage, his Council, and Succeſs in this buſineſs; there is nothing left to the memory of Man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred Millions, and the lives of above four hundred thouſand Chriſtians, for the loſs of all thoſe Countries; which, for beauty gave place to none, and for Revenue, did equal his Weſt-Indies: for the loſs of a Nation, which moſt willingly obeyed him; and who at this Day, after forty Years War, are in deſpight of all his Forces become free Eſtates, and far more rich and powerful, than they were, when he firſt began to impoveriſh and oppreſs them.

Oh by what plots, by what forſwearings, betrayings, oppreſſions, impriſonments, tortures, poyſonings, and under what reaſons of State, and politick ſubtilty, have theſe fore-named Kings, both Strangers, and of our own Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themſelves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent Miniſters! and in the end have brought thoſe things to paſs for their Enemies, and ſeen an effect ſo directly contrary to all their own own counſels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themſelves; and the other never have ſucceeded; if no ſuch oppoſition had ever been made. GOD hath ſaid it and performed it ever: Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum, I will deſtroy the wiſdom of the wiſe.

But what of all this? and to what end do we lay before the Eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead: ſeeing the World is the ſame that it hath been; and the Children of the preſent time, will ſtill obey their Parents? It is in the preſent time, that all the wits of the World are exerciſed. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawful: and either we hope to hold them for ever; or at leaſt we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as we are content to forget our own experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledge, in all things that concern our ſelves; or perſwade our ſelves, that GOD hath given us Letters Patents to purſue all our irreligious affections, with a non obſtante: ſo we neither look behind us what hath been, nor before us what ſhall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the Body: we are by it joyned to the Earth: we are compounded of Earth; and we inhabit it. The Heavens are high, far off and unſearchable: we have ſenſe and feeling of Corporal things; and of Eternal grace, but by Revelation. No marvel then that our thoughts are alſo Earthly: and it is leſs to be wondred at, that the words of worthleſs Men cannot cleanſe them; ſeeing their Doctrine and Inſtruction, whoſe Underſtanding the Holy Ghoſt vouchſafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For as the Prophet Iſaiah cried out long agone, Lord, who hath believed our reports? And out of doubt, as Iſaiah complained then for himſelf and others: ſo are they leſs believed, every day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in every Man's Mouth, yea in the diſcourſe of every Woman, who for the greateſt number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an univerſal diſſimulation? We profeſs that we know GOD: but by works we deny him. For Beatitude doth not conſiſt in the knowledge of Divine things, but in a Divine life: for the Devils know them better than Men. Beatitudo non eſt divinorum cognitio, ſed vita divina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private Contention, the paſſionate Diſpute, the perſonal Hatred, and the perpetual War, Maſſacres, and Murders, for Religion among Chriſtians: the diſcourſe whereof hath ſo occupied the World, as it hath well-near driven the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not ſoon reſolve, that took knowledge but of the Religious diſputations among Men, and not of their lives which diſpute, that there were no other thing in their deſires, than the purchace of Heaven; and that the World it ſelf were but uſed as it ought, and as an Inn or Place, wherein to repoſe our ſelves in paſſing on towards our Celeſtial habitation? when on the contrary, beſides the diſcourſe and outward profeſſion, the Soul hath nothing but Hypocriſie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in Religion: and while we act in geſture and voice, Divine vertues, in all the courſe of our lives we renounce our Perſons, and the Parts we Play. For Charity, Juſtice, and Truth, have but their being in terms, like the Philoſophers Materia prima.

Paul to Titus *Ch.*1. ver. 10.

Neither is it that Wiſdom, which Salomon defineth to be the School-Miſtreſs of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the World: it is enough that we give it our good word; but the ſame which is altogether exerciſed in the ſervice of the World, as the gathering of Riches chiefly; by which we purchaſe and obtain honour, with the many reſpects which attend it.

Theſe

These indeed be the Marks (which when we have bent our Consciences to the highest) we all shoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the Care is our own; the Care our own in this Life, the Peril our own in the future: and yet when we have gathered the greatest abundance, we our selves enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one Man. For the rest; He that had the greatest Wisdom, and the greatest Ability that ever Man had, hath told us that this is the Use: When Goods increase (saith Salomon) they also increase that eat them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their Eyes? As for those that devour the rest, and follow us in fair Weather: they again forsake us in the first Tempest of Misfortune, and steer away before the Sea and Wind; leaving us to the malice of our Destinies. Of these, among a thousand Examples, I will take but one out of Master Damet, and use his own words: Whilst the Emperour Charles the Fifth, after the resignation of his Estates, stayed at Vlushing for Wind, to carry him his last Journey into Spain; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his Brother Ferdinand's Embassadour, till the deep of the Night. And when Seldius should depart, the Emperour calling for some of his Servants, and no body answering him (for those that attended upon him, were some gone to their Lodgings, and all the rest asleep) the Emperour took up the Candle himself, and went before Seldius to light him down the Stairs; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the Stairs foot, He said thus unto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast known in thy Time environed with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of Souldiers, thou hast also seen alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea even of his own domestical Servants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD; which I will by no means go about to withstand.

Eccles. 5. 10. 11.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reverend Respect that is held of great Men, and the Honour done unto them by all sorts of People. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward Love for their Justice and Piety, accompany the outward Worship given to their Places and Power; without which what is the Applause of the Multitude, but as the outcry of an Herd of Animals, who, without the knowledge of any true Cause, please themselves with the Noise they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) have ever been applauded; the most vertuous (if unprosperous) have ever been despised. For as Fortune's Man rides the Horse, so Fortune her self rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on Foot: the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base Groom beats the one, and a bitter Contempt spurns at the other, with equal liberty.

The second, is the greatning of our Posterity, and the contemplation of their Glory whom we leave behind us. Certainly, of those which conceive that their Souls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them, which Lactantius spake of certain Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our Spirits immortal shall be once separate from our mortal Bodies, and disposed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other Joy of their Posterity which succeed, than there doth of Pride in that Stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a King's Palace; nor any other Sorrow for their Poverty, than there doth of Shame in that, which beareth up a Begger's Cottage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt vivi etiam eorum filii; quia animæ mortuorum rebus viventium non intersunt. The Dead though holy, know nothing of the Living, no, not of their own Children; for the Souls of those departed, are not converſant with their Affairs that remain. And if we doubt of Saint Auguſtine, we cannot of Job; who tells us, That we know not if our Sons ſhall be Honourable: neither ſhall we underſtand concerning them, whether they ſhall be of low Degree. Which Eccleſiaſtes alſo confirmeth: Man walketh in a ſhadow, and diſquieteth himſelf in vain: he heapeth up Riches, and cannot tell who ſhall gather them. The living (ſaith he) know that they ſhall die, but the dead know nothing at all. For who can ſhew unto Man, what ſhall be after him under the Sun? He therefore accounted it among the reſt of Worldly Vanities, to labour and travel in the World, not knowing after Death, whether a Fool or a wiſe Man ſhould enjoy the Fruits thereof: which made me (ſaith he) endeavour even to abhor mine own Labour. And what can other Men hope, whoſe bleſſed or ſorrowful eſtates after Death GOD hath reſerved? Man's Knowledge lying but in his Hope; ſeeing the Prophet Eſay confeſſeth of the Elect, That Abraham is ignorant of us, and Iſrael knows us not. But hereof we are aſſured, that the long and dark Night of Death: of whoſe following Day we ſhall never behold the dawn, till his return that hath triumphed over it) ſhall cover us over, till the World be no more. After which, and when we ſhall again receive Organs glorified and incorruptible, the ſeats of Angelical Affections: in ſo great admiration ſhall the Souls of the bleſſed be exerciſed, as they cannot admit the mixture of any ſecond or leſs Joy; nor any return of forgone and mortal Affection, towards Friends, Kindred or Children. Of whom whether we ſhall retain any particular knowledge, or in any ſort diſtinguiſh them: no Man can aſſure us; and the wiſeſt Men doubt. But on the contrary; If a Divine Life retain any of thoſe Faculties, which the Soul exerciſed in a mortal Body; we ſhall not at that time ſo divide the Joys of Heaven, as to caſt any part thereof on the memory of their Felicities which remain in the World. No; be their Eſtates greater than ever the World gave, we ſhall (by the difference known unto us) even deteſt their conſideration. And whatſoever Comfort ſhall remain of all forepaſt, the ſame will conſiſt in the Charity, which we exerciſed living: and in that Piety, Juſtice, and firm Faith, for which it pleaſed the infinite mercy of GOD to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value Honour and Riches at nothing, and neglect them, as unneceſſary and vain? certainly no. For that infinite Wiſdom of GOD, which hath diſtinguiſhed his Angels by Degrees: which hath given greater and leſs Light, and Beauty to Heavenly Bodies: which hath made differences between Beaſts and Birds: created the Eagle and the Fly, the Cedar and the Shrub: and among Stones, given the faireſt tincture to the Ruby, and the quickeſt light to the Diamond; hath alſo ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the People, Magiſtrates, Judges, and other Degrees among Men. And as Honour is left to Poſterity, for a Mark and Enſign of the Vertue and Underſtanding of their Anceſtors: ſo, ſeeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggery: and that Titles, without proportionable Eſtates, fall under the miſerable ſuccour of other Mens Pity; I account it fooliſhneſs to condemn ſuch a Care: Provided, that worldly Goods be well gotten, and that we raiſe not our own Buildings out of other Mens Ruines. For as Plato doth firſt prefer the perfection of bodily Health; ſecondly, the Form and Beauty; and thirdly, Divitias nulla fraude quæſitas: ſo Jeremy cries, Wo unto them that erect their Houſes by unrighteouſneſs, and their Chambers without Equity: and Eſay the ſame, Wo to thoſe that ſpoil and were not ſpoiled. And it was out of the true Wiſdom of Salomon, that he commandeth us, not to drink the Wine of Violence; not to lie in wait for Blood; and not to ſwallow them up alive, whoſe Riches we covet: for ſuch are the Ways (ſaith he) of every one that is greedy of Gain.

Lact. de falsâ sap. 3. c. 29.

S. Aug. de cura pro mort.

Prov. 1. 18. 12. Prov. 23. 1, 3. 8. 9. 3 T. 8. 9.

And

And if we could afford our ſelves but ſo much Leiſure as to conſider, That he which hath moſt in the World, hath, in reſpect of the World, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longeſt time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, ſetting it either by that which is paſt when we were not, or by that time which is to come in which we ſhall abide for ever: I ſay, if both, to wit our proportion in the World, and our time in the World, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not out of any excellency of Underſtanding, that we ſo much priſe the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and ſo much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coveting thoſe mortal things of the World, as if our Souls were therein immortal, and neglecting thoſe things which are immortal, as if our ſelves after the World were but mortal.

But let every Man value his own Wiſdom, as he pleaſeth. Let the rich Man think all Fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the Revenger eſteem all negligent, that have not troden down their Oppoſites; the Politician, all groſs, that cannot Merchandize their Faith: Yet when we once come in ſight of the Port of Death, to which all Winds drive us; and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the Navigation of this Life takes end: Then it is I ſay, that our own Cogitations (thoſe ſad and ſevere Cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health and Felicity) return again, and pay us to the uttermoſt for all the pleaſing Paſſages of our Lives paſt. It is then that we cry out to GOD for mercy; then, when our ſelves can no longer exerciſe Cruelty towards others: and it is only then, that we are ſtrucken through the Soul with this terrible Sentence, That GOD will not be mockt. For if according to Saint Peter, The Righteous ſcarcely be ſaved: and that GOD ſpared not his Angels: where ſhall thoſe appear, who, having ſerved their Appetites all their Lives, preſume to think, that the ſevere Commandments of the All-powerful GOD were given but in ſport; and that the ſhort Breath, which we draw when death preſſeth us, if we can but faſhion it to the ſound of Mercy (without any kind of Satisfaction or Amends) is ſufficient? O quam multi, ſaith a reverend Father, cum hac ſpe ad æternos labores & bella deſcendunt: I confeſs that it is a great Comfort to our Friends, to have it ſaid, that we ended well: for we all deſire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what ſhall we call a diſeſteeming, an appoſing, or (indeed) a mocking of GOD; if thoſe Men do not appoſe him, diſeſteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for GOD, to ask him forgiveneſs at leiſure, with the remainder and laſt drawing of a malicious Breath? For what do they otherwiſe, that die this kind of well-dying, but ſay unto GOD as followeth? We beſeech thee O GOD, that all the Falſhoods, Forſwearings, and Treacheries of our Lives paſt, may be pleaſing unto thee; that thou wilt for our ſakes (that have had no leiſure to do any thing for thine) change thy Nature (though impoſſible) and forget to be a juſt GOD; that thou wilt love Injuries and Oppreſſions, call Ambition Wiſdom, and Charity Fooliſhneſs. For I ſhall prejudice my Son (which I am reſolved not to do) if I make reſtitution; and confeſs my ſelf to have been unjuſt (which I am too proud to do) if I deliver the oppreſſed. Certainly, theſe wiſe Worldlings have either found out a new GOD; or have made One: and in all likelihood ſuch a Leaden One, as Lewis the Eleventh ware in his Cap; which, when he had cauſed any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his Head and kiſs it: beſeeching it to pardon him this one evil act more, and it ſhould be the laſt, which, (as at other times) he did; when by the practice of a Cardinal and a falſified Sacrament, he cauſed the Earl of Armagnack magnack to be ſtabbed to death; Mockeries indeed fit to be uſed towards a Leaden, but not towards the ever-living GOD. But of this Compoſition are all the devout lovers of the World, that they fear all that is dureleſs and ridiculous: they fear the Plots and Practices of their Oppoſites, and their very Whiſperings: they fear the Opinions of Men which beat but upon ſhadows: they flatter and forſake the proſperous and unproſperous, be they Friends or Kings: yea they dive under Water, like Ducks, at every Pebble-ſtone, that's but thrown towards them by a powerful hand: and on the contrary, they ſhew an obſtinate and Giant-like Valour, againſt the terrible Judgments of the All-powerful GOD: yea they ſhew themſelves gods againſt GOD, and ſlaves towards Men; towards Men whoſe Bodies and Conſciences are alike rotten.

Now for the reſt: If we truly examine the difference of both Conditions; to wit of the Rich and Mighty, whom we call Fortunate; and of the Poor and Oppreſſed, whom we account Wretched: we ſhall find the Happineſs of the one, and the miſerable Eſtate of the other, ſo tied by GOD to the very inſtant, and both ſo ſubject to interchange (witneſs the ſudden downfall of the greateſt Princes, and the ſpeedy upriſing of the meaneſt Perſons) as the one hath nothing ſo certain, whereof to boaſt; nor the other ſo uncertain, whereof to bewail it ſelf. For there is no Man ſo aſſured of his Honour, of his Riches, Health or Life; but that he may be deprived of either or all, the very next Hour or Day to come. Quid veſper vehat, incertum eſt, What the Evening will bring with it, it is uncertain. And yet ye cannot tell (ſaith Saint James) what ſhall be to morrow. To day he is ſet up, and to morrow he ſhall not be found? for he is turned into duſt, and his Purpoſe periſheth. Jam. 4. 14. And although the Air which compaſſeth Adverſity, be very obſcure: yet therein we better diſcern GOD, than in that ſhining Light which environeth worldly Glory; through which, for the clearneſs thereof, there is no Vanity which eſcapeth our Sight. And let Adverſity ſeem what it will; to happy Men, ridiculous, who make themſelves merry at other Mens Misfortunes; and to thoſe under the Croſs, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is paſt, to the very inſtant, the Portions remaining are equal to either. For be it that we have lived many years, and (according to Salomon) in them all we have rejoyced; or be it that we have meaſured the ſame length of Days, and therein have evermore ſorrowed: yet looking back from our preſent being, we find both the one and the other, to wit, the Joy and the Woe, ſailed out of ſight; and Death which doth purſue us and hold us in chace, from our Infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro eſt, mors tenet: Whatſoever of our age is paſt, Death holds it. So as whoſoever he be, to whom Fortune hath been a Servant, and the Time a Friend: let him but take the account of his Memory (for we have no other keeper of our Pleaſures paſt) and truly examine what it hath reſerved, either of Beauty and Youth, or foregone Delights; what it hath ſaved, that it might laſt, of his deareſt Affections, or of what ever elſe the amarous Spring-time gave his thoughts of Contentment, then unvaluable; and he ſhall find that all the Art which his elder years have, can draw no other Vapour out of theſe Diſſolutions, than heavy, ſecret, and ſad Sighs. He ſhall find nothing remaining, but thoſe Sorrows, which grow up after our faſt-ſpringing Youth; overtake it, when it is at a ſtand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither: in ſo much as looking back from the very inſtant time, and from our now being; the poor, diſeaſed, and captive Creature, hath as little Senſe of all his former Miſeries and Pains; as he, that is moſt bleſt in common Opinion, hath of his fore-paſſed Pleaſures and and delights. For whatſoever is caſt behind us, is juſt nothing: and what is to come, deceitful hope hath it. Omnia quæ eventura ſunt, in incerto jacent. Only thoſe few black Swans I muſt except, who having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold Death without dread, and the Grave without fear; and embrace both, as neceſſary guides to endleſs Glory.

For my ſelf, this is my conſolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the ſorrows of this life, are but of two ſorts: whereof the one hath reſpect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the firſt, we complain to GOD againſt our ſelves, for our offences againſt him; and confeſs, Et tu juſtus es in omnibus quæ venerunt ſuper nos. And thou, O Lord, art juſt in all that hath befallen us. In the ſecond, we complain to our ſelves againſt GOD, as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly Goods and Honours, anſwering our Appetites; or for taking them again from us, having had them: forgetting that humble and juſt acknowledgment of Job, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken To the firſt of which S. Paul hath promiſed Bleſſedneſs; to the ſecond, Death. And out of doubt he is either a Fool or ungrateful to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how mean ſoever his Eſtate be, that the ſame is yet far greater, than that which GOD oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how ſharp ſoever his Afflictions be, that the ſame are yet far leſs, than thoſe which are due unto him. And if an Heathen wiſe Man call the Adverſities of the World, but tributa vivendi, the tributes of living: a wiſe Chriſtian Man ought to know them, and bear them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them Manlike, and reſolvedly; and not as thoſe whining Soldiers do, qui gementes ſequuntur Imperatorem.

For ſeeing God, who is the Author of all our Tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the Parts we are to Play: and hath not, in their diſtribution, been partial to the moſt mighty Princes of the World; That gave unto Darius the part of the greateſt Emperor, and the part of the moſt miſerable Begger; a Begger begging Water of an Enemy, to quench the great drought of Death; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the Morning, and in the ſame Day the Foot-ſtool of Tamerlane (both which Parts Valerian had alſo played, being taken by Sapores) that made Beliſarius play the moſt Victorious Captain, and laſtly the Part of a blind Begger; of which examples many thouſands may be produced: why ſhould other Men, who are but as the leaſt Worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous World, than to reſolve, That the change of Fortune on the great Theatre, is but as the change of Garments on the leſs. For when on the one and the other, every Man wears but his own Skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any Man, out of weakneſs, prize the paſſages of this World otherwiſe (for ſaith Petrarch, Magni ingenii eſt revocare mentem à ſenſibus) it is by reaſon of that unhappy fantaſie of ours, which forgeth in the Brains of Man all the miſeries (the corporal excepted) whereunto he is ſubject: Therein it is, that Misfortune and Adverſitie work all that they work. For ſeeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatſoevet Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a fooliſh madneſs in the Shipwrack of worldly things, where all ſinks but the Sorrow, to ſave it. That were, as Seneca ſaith, Fortunæ ſuccumbere, quod triſtius eſt omni fato; to fall under Fortune, of all other the moſt miſerable deſtiny.

But

But it is now time to ſound a Retreat; and to deſire to be excuſed of this long purſuit: and withal, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the Picture of time paſt (which we call Hiſtory) in ſo large a table, may alſo be accepted in place of a better reaſon.

The examples of Divine Providence, every where found (the firſt Divine Hiſtories being nothing elſe but a continuation of ſuch examples) have perſwaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though theſe two glorious actions of the Almighty be ſo near, and (as it were) linked together, that the one neceſſarily implieth the other: Creation, inferring Providence: (for what Father forſaketh the Child that he hath begotten? and Providence preſuppoſing Creation) yet many of thoſe that have ſeemed to excel in worldly wiſdom, have gone about to diſ-joyn this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the World had a beginning; the Ariſtotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this Doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by Faith we underſtand, that the World was made by the Word of God) be too weighty a Work for Ariſtotle's rotten Ground to bear up, upon which he hath (notwithſtanding) founded the Defences and Fortreſſes of all his Verbal Doctrine: Yet that the neceſſity of Infinite Power, and the Worlds beginning, and the impoſſibility of the contrary even in the judgment of Natural reaſon, wherein he believed, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no leſs ſtrange, that thoſe Men which are deſirous of knowledge, (ſeeing Ariſtotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than terms in the reſt) have ſo retrench'd their minds from the following and overtaking of truth, and ſo abſolutely ſubjected themſelves to the Law of thoſe Philoſophical Principles; as all contrary kind of teaching, in the ſearch of cauſes, they have condemned either for phantaſtical, or curious. But doth it follow, that the poſitions of Heathen Philoſophers, are undoubted Grounds and Principles indeed, becauſe ſo called? Or that ipſi dixerunt, doth make them to be ſuch? certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reaſon hath built any thing ſo ſtrong againſt it ſelf, as the ſame reaſon can hardly aſſail it, much leſs batter it down: the ſame in every queſtion of Nature, and finite Power, may be approved for a Fundamental Law of Humane knowledge. For ſaith Charron in his Book of Wiſdom, Tout propoſition humaine a autant d'authorité que l'autre, ſi la raiſon n'on fait la difference. Every Humane propoſition hath equal Authority, if reaſon make not the difference, the reſt being but the Fables of Principles. But hereof how ſhall the upright and unpartial Judgment of Man give a Sentence, where Oppoſition and Examination are not admitted to give in Evidence? And to this purpoſe it was well ſaid of Lactantius, Sapientiam ſibi adimunt, qui ſine ullo judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur. They neglect their own Wiſdom, who without any Judgment approve the invention of thoſe that fore-went them; and ſuffer themſelves, after the manner of Beaſts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which ſloth and dulneſs, ignorance is now become ſo powerful a Tyrant: as it hath ſet true Philoſophy, Phyſick, and Divinity, in a Pillory; and written over the firſt, Contra negantem Principia; over the ſecond, Virtus ſpecifica; and over the third, Eccleſia Romana.

Charron de Sageſſe.

Lact. de Orig. Erroris. l.2.c.8.

But for my ſelf, I ſhall never be perſwaded, that GOD hath ſhut up all light of Learning within the Lanthorn of Ariſtotle's Brains: or that it was ever ſaid unto him, as unto Eſdras, Accendam in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectus: that GOD hath given invention but to the Heathen; and that they only have

have invaded Nature, and found the ſtrength and bottom thereof; the ſame Nature having conſumed all her Store, and left nothing of Price to after-ages. That theſe and theſe be the cauſes of theſe and theſe effects, Time hath taught us; and not Reaſon: and ſo hath Experience, without Art. The Cheeſe-wife knoweth it as well as the Philoſopher, that ſowre Runnet doth coagulate her Milk into a Curd. But if we ask a reaſon of this cauſe, why the ſowreneſs doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how; I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philoſophy, to ſatisfie this and many other like vulgar queſtions. But Man, to cover his ignorance in the leaſt things, who cannot give a true reaſon for the Graſs under his Feet, why it ſhould be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet diſcover the way and reaſon of Natures working, in thoſe which are far leſs noble Creatures than himſelf; who is far more Noble than the Heavens themſelves: Man (ſaith Salomon) that can hardly diſcern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find out the things that are before us; that hath ſo ſhort a time in the World, as he no ſooner begins to learn, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his underſtanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Eſſence of his own Soul, and which the wiſeſt of the Naturaliſts (if Ariſtotle be he) could never ſo much as define, but by the action and effect, telling us what it works (which all Men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any elſe, doth know, but GOD that created it; (for though I were perfect, yet I know not my Soul, ſaith Job.) Man I ſay, that is but an Idiot in the next cauſe of his own life, and in the cauſe of all the actions of his life, will (notwithſtanding) examine the Art of GOD in Creating the World; of GOD who (ſaith Job) is ſo excellent as we know him not; and examine the beginning of the Work, which had end before Mankind had a beginning of being. He will diſable GOD's Power to make a World, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the Moths of the Air for a cauſe; caſt the work on neceſſity or chance; beſtow the honour thereof on Nature; make two Powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Form; and laſtly, for want of a Work-man, have it Eternal: which latter opinion Ariſtotle, to make himſelf the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectators have maintained it; parati ac conjurati, quos ſequuntur, Philoſophorum animis invictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or ſoon after, Moſes, Zoroaſter, Muſæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Meliſſus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whoſe opinions are exquiſitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the neceſſity of invincible reaſon, one Eternal and Infinite Being, to be the Parent of the Univerſal. Horum omnium ſententia quamvis ſit incerta, eodem tamen ſpectat, ut Providentiam unam eſſe conſentiant: ſive enim Natura, ſive Æther, ſive Ratio, ſive mens, ſive fatalis neceſſitas, ſive divina Lex; idem eſſe quod à nobis dicitur Deus. All theſe Mens opinions (ſaith Lactantius) though uncertain, come to this, That they agree upon one Providence; whether the ſame be Nature, or Light, or Reaſon, or Underſtanding, or Deſtiny, or Divine Ordinance; that it is the ſame which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the World, though they have divers riſings, and divers runnings; though they ſometimes hide themſelves for a while under Ground, and ſeem to be loſt in Sea-like Lakes; do at laſt find, and fall into the great Ocean: ſo after all the ſearches that Humane capacity hath; and after all Philoſophical contemplation and curioſity; in the neceſſity of this Infinite Power, all the Reaſon of Man ends and diſſolves it ſelf.

Salomon. 1. 9.

Job. 26.

Lact. 5.

As

As for others; and first touching those, which conceive the matter of the World to have been Eternal, and that God did not create the World ex nihilo, but ex materiâ præexistente: the supposition is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere. They seem unto me, which affirm this, to give part of the work to God, and part to Fortune. Insomuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had neither been Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Universal. For were the Matter or Chaos, Eternal: it then follows, That either this supposed Matter did fit it self to God; or God, accommodate himself to the Matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Workman's will. For the second; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applied himself, according to the proportion of Matter which he lighted upon.

Euseb. de Prap. Evang. l. 7. c. 8.

But let it be supposed, That this matter had been made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learn how it came to pass, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent and infinitely wise; and no more, nor no less, than served to receive the form of the Universal. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as served to finish the work of the World: Or had there been more of this matter, than sufficed, then did God dissolve and annihilate whatsoever remained and was superfluous. And this must every reasonable Soul confess, That it is the same Work of God alone, to Create any thing out of nothing; And by the same Art and Power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that Eternal matter, be again changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it self; this, of all other, were the greatest Idiotism. For, if it were the cause of it self at any time; then there was also a time when it self was not: at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceive, that it could neither produce it self, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible, Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neque seipsum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth precede it self, neither do Bodies compound themselves.

For the rest; Those that feign this matter to be Eternal, must of necessity confess, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite form, but that the first matter was finite, the form which it received proves it. For conclusion of this part; whosoever will make choice, rather to believe in Eternal deformity, or in Eternal dead matter, than in Eternal light and Eternal life: let Eternal death be his reward. For it is a madness of that kind, as wanteth terms to express it. For what reason of Man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That Infinite Power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of Shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it self, either for matter or form; yea for as many Worlds (if such had been GOD's Will) as the Sea hath Sands? For where the Power is without limitation, the Work hath no other limitation, than the Workman's will. Yea Reason it self finds it more easie for infinite Power, to deliver from it self a finite World, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite Man, a Fool and Dust, to change the form of matter made to his Hands. They are Dionysius his words, Deus in una existentia omnia omnia præhabet; and again, Esse omnium est ipsa Divinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides; to wit, causaliter, or in better terms, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa universalis. Neither hath the World Universal closed up all of GOD: For the most parts of his Works (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his Wisdom be opened, by the glorious Work of the World: which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his Infinite Power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, That we seldome entitle GOD, the all-shewing, or the all-willing; but the all-mighty; that is, infinitely able. Cap. 16. v. 21.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing, nothing is made, infer the Worlds Eternity; and yet not so salvage therein, as those are, which give an Eternal being to dead matter: It is true, if the word [nothing] be taken in the Affirmative; and the making, imposed upon Natural Agents and finite Power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle himself confesseth, Quod omnes antiqui decreverunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumque infinitum. That all the Ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be Infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium ejus est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia complecti ac regere. It is strange that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of falshood, to conclude falsly; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For if we compare the World Universal, and all the unmeasurable Orbs of Heaven, and those marvellous Bodies of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, with ipsum infinitum: it may truly be said of them all, which himself affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in GOD's Power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, and Empedocles, call the World Universal, but particulam Universitatis & Infinitatis: a parcel of that which is the Universality and the Infinity it self; and Plato, but a shadow of GOD. But the other, to prove the Worlds Eternity, urgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient and effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring, that GOD being for ever a sufficient and effectual cause of the World, the effect of the cause should also have been for ever; to wit, the World Universal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to confess a sufficient and effectual cause of the World, (to wit an almighty GOD) in his Antecedent: and the same GOD to be a GOD restrained in his Conclusion; to make GOD free in Power, and bound in Will; able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of GOD, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding; which cannot but work matter being present; as fire, to burn things combustible. Stenc. Eng. l 3. c. 9. ex Arist. Phys. 3. 20.

Again he thus disputeth, That every Agent which can work, and doth not work: if it afterward work, it is either thereto moved by it self, or by somewhat else; and so it passeth from power to act. But GOD (saith he) is immovable, and is neither moved by himself, nor by any other; but being always the same, doth always work: whence he concludeth, if the World were caused by GOD, that he was for ever the cause thereof; and therefore Eternal. The answer to this is very easie; For that GOD's performing in due time that, which he ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his Will, which made the World for ever, did also withhold the effect to the time ordained. To this Answer, in it self sufficient, others add further, that the Pattern or Image of the World may be said to be Eternal: which the Platonicks call, spiritualem mundum; and do in this sort distinguish the Idæa, and Creation in time. Spiritualis ille mundus, mundi hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, cvita æquali est Architecto; fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus. That Representative, or the intentional World (say they) the Samplar of this visible World, the first Work of GOD, was equally ancient with the Architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever shall be. This material World, the second Work or Creature of GOD, doth differ from the Worker in this, That it was not from everlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for ever to come. The first Point, That it was not for ever, all Christians confess: The other they understand no otherwise, than that after the consummation of this World, there shall be a new Heaven and a new Earth; without any new creation of Matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such Opinions be not unworthy the propounding; in this Consideration, of an eternal and unchangeable Cause, producing a changeable and temporal Effect. Touching which Point Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded essence of the World, (and because compounded, therefore dissipable) is continued, and knit to the Divine Being, by an individual and inseparable Power, flowing from Divine Unity; and that the Worlds natural Appetite of GOD sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a Goodness and Understanding Divine; and that this Vertue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine Infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little; even as the whole Material World is not altogether: but the abolished Parts are departed by small Degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small Degrees succeed; as the shadow of a Tree in a River, seemeth to have continued the same a long time in the Water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continual ebbing and flowing thereof.

Mar. Ficin. de immort. Anima. l. 18. c. 1.

But to return to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, withall deny that ever it shall have any end; and to this purpose affirm, That it was never heard, never read, never seen, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heavens have ever suffered Corruption; or that they appear any way the Elder by continuance; or in any sort otherwise than they were; which had they been subject to final corruption, some change would have been discerned in so long a time: To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newness, and that they have not continued so long; than that they will continue for ever as they are. And if conjectural Arguments may receive Answer by Conjectures: it then seemeth, that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Pliny, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others were grosly mistaken: or else those parts of the World, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sun's Heat; neither were the Seas under the Equinoctial, navigable. But we know by Experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with People, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, over which we navigate, passable enough. We read also many Histories of Deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, divers places in the World were burnt up by the Sun's violent Heat.

Arist. Met. 2. Plin. l. 2. c. 8. Strab. l. 3. Beda de ratione tem. 11. c. 32. Thom. 1. p. q. 102. art. 2.

But

But in a Word, this observation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That Stone-walls, of matter moldring and friable, have stood two or three thousand years: that many things have been digged up out of the Earth, of that depth, as supposed to have been buried by the general Flood; without any alteration either of Substance or Figure, yea it is believed, and it is very probable, that the Gold which is daily found in Mines, and Rocks, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if Bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times have not invaded and corrupted: what great alteration should we look for in Celestial and Quintessential Bodies? And yet we have reason to think, that the Sun, by whose help all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We have neither Gyants, such as the eldest World had: nor mighty Men, such as the elder World had: but all things in general are reputed of less Vertue, which from the Heavens receive Vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger Discourse, we might easily fetch store of proof: as that this World shall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good Answer that can be made to this Objection: If the World were Eternal; why not all things in the World Eternal? If there were no First, no Cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible Wisdom, but that every Nature had been alike eternal; and Man more Rational than every other Nature: Why had not the eternal Reason of Man, provided for his eternal being in the World? For if all were equal: why not equal Conditions to all? why should Heavenly Bodies live for ever; and the Bodies of Men rot and die.

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keep the Center, and gave Order that it should hang in the Air: that the Sun should travel between the Tropicks, and never exceed those Bounds, nor fail to perform that Progress once in every Year: The Moon to live by borrowed Light: the fixt Stars (according to common Opinion) to be fastened like Nails in a Cart-Wheel, and the Planets to wander at their Pleasure? Or if none of these had power over other: was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sun by his perpetual travel within those two Circles, hath visited, given Light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turns and times? Out of doubt, if the Sun have of his own accord kept this Course in all Eternity: He may justly be called eternal Charity, and everlasting Love. The same may be said of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and clear Fountains of Vertue and Operation, may also be called eternal Vertues: the Earth may be called eternal Patience; the Moon, an eternal Borrower and Begger; and Man of all other the most miserable, eternally Mortal. And what were this, but to believe again in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than ever Hesiodus dream'd of. But in stead of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortal Eyes: and the Eyes of our Reason discern it better; That the Sun, Moon, Stars, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they have not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit, Every thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this Name, the School of Aristotle hath both commended many Errors unto us, and sought also thereby to obscure the Glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the ſecond of Ariſtotle's Phyſicks, or primo de Cœlo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphyſicks; I ſay that the beſt is but nominal, and ſerving only to difference the beginning of Natural Motion, from Artificial: which yet the Academicks open better, when they call it A ſeminary Strength, infuſed into Matter by the Soul of the World: who give the firſt place to Providence, the ſecond to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providentia (by which they underſtand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex Providentia prodiens; Natura poſtremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of theſe (GOD excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath Choice or Underſtanding (both which are neceſſarily in the cauſe of all things) no Man hath avowed. For this is unanſwerable of Lact. de ira Dei l. 1. c. 10. Lactantius: Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut ſcientiam; He only can be ſaid to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

Ficin. in Plat. But the Will and Science of Nature, are in theſe words truly expreſt by Ficinus: Poteſt ubique Natura, vel per diverſa media, vel ex diverſis materiis, diverſa facere: ſublata vero mediorum materiarumque diverſitate, vel unicum vel ſimillimum operatur, neque poteſt quando adeſt materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diverſity of Means, or out of diverſity of Matter, to produce divers things: but taking away the diverſity of Means, and the diverſity of Matter, it then works but one or the like Work; neither can it but work, Matter being preſent. Now if Nature made choice of diverſity of Matter, to work all theſe variable Works of Heaven and Earth; it had then both Underſtanding and Will; it had Counſel to begin; Reaſon to diſpoſe; Vertue and Knowledge to finiſh; and Power to govern: without which, all things had been but one and the ſame: all of the Matter of Heaven; or all of the Matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this Will, and this Underſtanding, this Counſel, Reaſon, and Power: Cur Natura potius, quam Deus nominetur? Why ſhould we then call ſuch a Cauſe rather Nature, than GOD? GOD of whom all Men have Notion, and give the firſt and higheſt place to Divine Power: Omnes homines rationem deorum habent, omneſque ſummum locum divino cuidam numini aſſignant. And this I ſay in ſhort; that it is a true effect of true Reaſon in Man (were there no Authority more binding than Reaſon) to acknowledge and adore the firſt and moſt ſublime Power. Vera Philoſophia, eſt aſcenſus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere ſunt, & ſemper eadem: True Philoſophy, is an aſcending from the things which flow, and riſe, and fall, to the things that are for ever the ſame.

Ariſt. l. 1. de cœlo. c. 3. T. 22.

For the reſt; I do alſo account it not the meaneſt, but an impiety monſtrous, to confound GOD and Nature: be it but in terms. For it is GOD, that only diſpoſeth of all things according to his own Will; and maketh of one Earth, Veſſels of Honour and Diſhonour. It is Nature that can diſpoſe of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is GOD, that commandeth all: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is GOD that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth: It is Nature, that ſecondarily doth alſo good, but it neither knoweth nor loveth the good it doth. It is GOD, that hath all things in himſelf: Nature, nothing in it ſelf. It is GOD, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liveth and laboureth; for by it ſelf it exiſteth not. For ſhall we ſay, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavy things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reaſon, which doth conduct every River into the ſalt Sea? Shall we term it knowledge in Fire, that makes it to conſume combuſtible matter? If it be Affection, Reaſon, and Knowledge in theſe: by the ſame Affection, Reaſon, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore ſeeing all things work as they do, (call it by Form, by Nature, or by what you pleaſe) yet becauſe they work by an impulſion, which they cannot reſiſt; or by a faculty, infuſed by the ſupremeſt Power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worſhip, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the Wonder, and to him is the Worſhip due, who hath created ſuch a Nature in things, and ſuch a Faculty, as neither knowing it ſelf, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; doth yet work all things to their laſt and uttermoſt perfection. And therefore every reaſonable Man, taking to himſelf for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all Men truly learned that ever the World had; to wit, That there is a Power Infinite, and Eternal, (which alſo neceſſity doth prove unto us, without the help of Faith; and Reaſon, without the force of Authority) all things do as eaſily follow which have been delivered by Divine Letters, as the Waters of a running River do ſucceſſively purſue each other from the firſt Fountains.

This much I ſay it is, that Reaſon it ſelf hath taught us: and this is the beginning of Knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio ſequitur: quia prius eſt Deum ſcire, conſequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion follows: becauſe it is firſt to know God, and then to worſhip him. This Sapience Plato calleth, abſoluti boni ſcientiam; The Science of the abſolute good: and another, Scientiam rerum primarum, ſempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (ſaith Iſidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reaſon and examples perſwaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur; ſed ratione & exemplis ſuadetur. I confeſs it, That to inquire further, as of the Eſſence of GOD, of his Power, of his Art, and by what mean he created the World: Or of his ſecret Judgment, and the Cauſes; is not an effect of Reaſon: Sed cum ratione inſaniunt, but they grow mad with Reaſon; that inquire after it. For as it is no ſhame nor diſhonour (ſaith a French Author) de faire arreſt aubut qu'on naſceu ſurpaſſer; For a Man to reſt himſelf there, where he finds it impoſſible to paſs on further: ſo whatſoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true Reaſon, it acknowledgeth it to be ſo; as Underſtanding it ſelf not to be Infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that beſt knows the end of his own Art. For ſeeing both Reaſon and Neceſſity teach us (Reaſon, which is pars divini ſpiritus in corpus humanum merſi) that the World was made by a Power Infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us: and ſeeing the ſame Reaſon and Neceſſity make us know, that the ſame Infinite Power is every where in the World; and yet how every where, it cannot inform us: our belief hereof is not weakned, but greatly ſtrengthned, by our ignorance; becauſe it is the ſame Reaſon that tells us, That ſuch a Nature cannot be ſaid to be God, that can be in all conceived by Man.

Lact. l. 4. c. 4. de vera Sapientia.

Iſaac de defin.

Quod eſt infinitum & non ſecundum naturam terminatum, non continetur à Scientia; Ariſt. Poſter.

I have been already over-long, to make any large diſcourſe either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine own excuſe: eſpecially in the excuſe of this or that paſſage; ſeeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the groſſeſt, the unſuitable diviſion of the Books, I could not know how to excuſe, had I not been directed to inlarge the Building after the Foundation was laid, and the Firſt Part finiſhed. All Men know that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of thoſe things, which are ſubject to number and meaſure. For the reſt, it ſuits well enough with a great many Books of this Age, which ſpeak too much, and yet ſay little; Ipſi nobis furto ſubducimur,

We are ſtollen away from our ſelves, ſetting a high price on all that is our own. But hereof, though a late good Writer, make complaint, yet ſhall it not lay hold on me, becauſe I believe as he doth; that who ſo thinks himſelf the wiſeſt Man, is but a poor and miſerable ignorant. Thoſe that are the beſt Men of War, againſt all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do always keep the ſtrongeſt Guards againſt themſelves, to defend them from themſelves, from ſelf-love, ſelf-eſtimation, and ſelf-opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the Work, I have only taken counſel from the Argument. For of the Aſſyrians, which after the downfal of Babel take up the firſt part, and were the firſt great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of Poſterity: ſome few enterpriſes, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the Story of the Hebrews, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the conſuming Diſeaſe of Time; and preſerved it ſelf, from the very cradle and beginning to this Day: and yet not ſo entire, but that the large diſcourſes thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The fragments of other Stories, with the actions of thoſe Kings and Princes which ſhot up here and there in the ſame time, I am driven to relate by way of digreſſion: of which we may ſay with Virgil, Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vaſto.

They appear here and there floting in the great gulf of time.

To the ſame firſt Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them derived to us; though moſt of the Authors Names have periſhed in ſo long a Navigation. For thoſe Ages had their Laws; they had diverſity of Government; they had Kingly Rule; Nobility, Policy in War; Navigation; and all, or the moſt of needful Trades. To ſpeak therefore of theſe (ſeeing in a general Hiſtory we ſhould have left a great deal of Nakedneſs by their omiſſion) it cannot properly be called a digreſſion. True it is that I have alſo made many others: which if they ſhall be laid to my charge, I muſt caſt the fault into the great heap of Humane error. For ſeeing we digreſs in all the ways of our lives: yea ſeeing the life of Man is nothing elſe but digreſſion; I may the better be excuſed, in writing their Lives and Actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Laws of Hiſtory, and of the Kinds.

The ſame hath been taught by many; but by no Man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Chriſtian Laws are alſo taught us by the Prophets and Apoſtles; and every Day preach'd unto us. But we ſtill make large digreſſions: yea the Teachers themſelves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the reſt; after ſuch time as the Perſians had wreſted the Empire from the Chaldæans, and had raiſed a great Monarchy, producing Actions of more importance than were elſewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilſt it ſo flouriſhed, that the Affairs of the Nations adjoyning had reference thereunto. The like obſervance was to be uſed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Perſians, as alſo towards the Affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who reſiſted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their compoſition and enlargement: it ſeemed beſt to remember what was known of them from their ſeveral beginnings, in ſuch times and places, as they in their flouriſhing eſtates oppoſed thoſe Monarchies; which in the end ſwallowed them up. And herein I have followed the beſt Geographers, who ſeldom give names to thoſe ſmall Brooks, whereof many joyned together, make great Rivers; till ſuch time as they become united, and run in a main Stream to the Ocean Sea. If the Phraſe be weak, and the Stile not every where like it ſelf: the firſt, ſhews their legitimation and true Parent; the ſecond, will excuſe it ſelf upon the variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili avena, uſed ſtronger Pipes when he ſounded the Wars of Æneas. It may alſo be laid to my charge, that I uſe divers Hebrew words in my Firſt Book, and elſewhere: in which Language others may think, and I my ſelf acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that ſome of them I find in Montanus; others in Latin Character in S. Senenſis, and of the reſt I have borrowed the interpretation of ſome of my learned Friends. But ſay I had been beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondred at, having had Eleven Years leiſure, to attain the knowledge of that, or of any other Tongue; howſoever, I know that it will be ſaid by many, That I might have been more pleaſing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine own times; having been permitted to draw Water as near the Well-head as another. To this I anſwer, That whoſoever in writing a modern Hiſtory, ſhall follow truth too near the Heels, it may happily ſtrike out his Teeth. There is no Miſtreſs or Guide, that hath led her followers and ſervants into greater miſeries. He that goes after her too far off, loſeth her ſight, and loſeth himſelf: and he that walks after her at a middle diſtance; I know not whether I ſhould call that kind of courſe Temper or Baſeneſs. It is true, that I never travelled after Mens opinions, when I might have made the beſt uſe of them: and I have now too few days remaining, to imitate thoſe, that either out of extream ambition, or extream cowardice, or both, do yet, (when death hath them on his Shoulders) flatter the World, between the Bed and the Grave. It is enough for me (being in that ſtate I am) to write of the eldeſt times: wherein alſo, why may it not be ſaid, that in ſpeaking of the paſt, I point at the preſent, and tax the vices of thoſe that are yet living, in their Perſons that are long ſince dead; and have it laid to my charge. But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themſelves ſpotted like the Tigers of old time, ſhall find fault with me for painting them over a new, they ſhall therein accuſe themſelves juſtly, and me falſly.

For I proteſt before the Majeſty of GOD, That I malice no Man under the Sun. Impoſſible I know it is to pleaſe all: ſeeing few or none are ſo pleaſed with themſelves, or ſo aſſured of themſelves, by reaſon of their ſubjection to their private paſſions; but that they ſeem divers Perſons in one and the ſame day. Seneca hath ſaid it, and ſo do I: Unus mihi pro populo erat: and to the ſame effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis ſed tibi; or (as it hath ſince lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the reſolution of an ancient Philoſopher, Satis eſt unus, Satis eſt nullus. For it was for the ſervice of that ineſtimable Prince Henry, the ſucceſſive hope, and one of the greateſt of the Chriſtian World, that I undertook this Work. It pleaſed him to peruſe ſome part thereof, and to pardon what was amiſs. It is now left to the World without a Maſter; from which all that is preſented, hath received both blows and thanks. Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus eſt omnis judicii, in quo lis ſecundùm plures datur. But theſe diſcourſes are idle. I know that as the charitable will judge charitably: ſo againſt thoſe, qui gloriantur in malitia, my preſent adverſity hath diſarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore have not far to fall: and for riſing again, as in the Natural privation there is no receſſion to habit; ſo is it ſeldom ſeen in the privation politick. I do therefore forbear to ſtile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good Opinions, or to promiſe a Second and Third Volume (which I alſo intend) if the Firſt receive Grace and good Acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certain, let us claw the Reader with never ſo many courteous Phraſes; yet ſhall we evermore be thought Fools, that write fooliſhly. For concluſion, all the hope I have lies in this, That I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous Readers of my Love towards them, and well-deſerving of them, than ever I ſhall do again. For had it been otherwiſe, I ſhould hardly have had this leiſure, to have made my ſelf a Fool in Print.

THE CONTENTS OF THE

Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, of the First Book of the First Part of the History of the World.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

§. I.

THAT the invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. 1. 1.

§. IV.

Of the meaning of the words [Heaven and Earth] Gen. 1. 1.

§. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moses understood in the word [Earth] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Unformed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

§. VI.

How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters: and that this not to be searched curiously.

§. VII.

Of the Light created, as the material substance of the Sun: and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any crystalline Heaven, or any Primum Mobile.

A conclusion, repeating the summ of the works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

§. X.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor Form, the giver of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Stars have great influence: and that their operations may diversly be prevented or furthered.

§. XII.

Of Prescience.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

§. XIV.

Of Predestination.

§. XV.

Of Fortune; and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

CHAP. II.

Of Man's Estate in his first Creation: and of God's Rest.

§. I.
OF the Image of God, according to which Man was first created.

§. II.
Of the intellectual mind of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sin.

§. III.
Of our base and frail Bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal Soul.

§. IV.
Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into Man in his Creation.

§. V.
That Man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

§. VI.
Of the free power, which Man had in his first Creation to dispose of himself.

§ VII.
Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Universal created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.
THAT the Seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that Men should err.

§. II.
A recital of strange opinions touching Paradise.

§. III.
That there was a true local Paradise, Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

§. IV.
Why it should be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

§. V.
That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

§. VI.
That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought, making the Ocean to be the Fountain of those four Rivers.

§. VII.
Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the Air.

§. VIII.
Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Æquinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climates.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Cœlesyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Isaiah 37. and Ezeck. 27.

§. X.
Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden: and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

§. XI.
Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one Stream.

§. XII.
Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian soil, as it is certain that Eden was such.

§. XIII.
Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

§. XIV.
Of the River Gehon, and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Æthiopia for Cush, 2 Chron. 21. 16.

§. XV.
A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.
THAT the Tree of Life was a material Tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden Fruit, is made subject to death.

§. II.
Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III.
Of Becanus his not unwitty allegorizing of the Story of his Ficus Indica.

§. IV.
Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil: with some other notes touching the Story of Adam's sin.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things between the Fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.

OF the cause, and the revenge of Cain's sin: and of his going out from God.

§. II.

Of Cain's dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cain's Generation.

§. IV.

Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs, when they begat their Children.

§. V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs: and of some of late memory.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their Knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

§. VII.

Of the Men of renown before the Flood.

§. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeed Men of huge Bodies: as also divers in latter times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World: and of the Relicks of Truth touching these ancient Times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

THAT in old corruptions we may find some signs of more ancient Truth.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Ægyptians.

§. III.

That in process of time these lesser Errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the gross superstitions of the Ægyptians.

§. IV.

That from the Relicks of ancient Records among the Ægyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and that the first Jupiter was Cain; Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

§. V.

Of the three chiefest Jupiters; and the strange Story of the third.

§. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had far better opinions of God.

§. VIII.

That Heathenism and Judaism, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

Of the last refuges of the Devil to maintain his Kingdom.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noah's Flood.

§. I.

OF God's fore-warning: and some Humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noah's Flood.

§. II.

Of the Flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noah's Flood.

§. III.

Of Deucalions Flood: and that this was not Noah's Flood: nor the Umbri in Italy a Remnant of any Universal Flood.

§. IV.

Of some other Records testifying the Universal Flood: and of two ancient deluges in Ægypt: and of some elsewhere.

§. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernatural, though some say it might have been fore-seen by the Stars.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the Universal Flood: and what are Cataractæ Cœli, Gen. 7. v. 11.

§. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made; the matter; fashion; and name.

That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

§. X.

That the Ark rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East-Indies and Scythia.

†. I.

A Preterition of some questions less material: with a note of the use of this question, to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

†. II.

A proposal of the common opinion, that the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

†. III.

The first Argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

†. IV.
The second Argument; That the Eastern People were more ancient in Populosity, and in all humane Glory.
†. V.
The third Argument; From the wonderful resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.
†. VI.
The fourth Argument; From divers Considerations in the Person of Noah.
†. VII.
Of the senseless opinion of Annius the Commenter upon Berosus, that the Ark rested upon Montes Caspii in Armenia; and yet upon Gordiæi, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.
†. VIII.
The fifth Argument; The Vine must grow naturally near the place where the Ark rested.
Answer to an objection out of the words of the Text. The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole Earth,
†. X.
An answer to an objection from the Name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.
†. XI.
Of Caucasus, and divers far higher Hills than the Armenian.
†. XII.
Of divers incongruities, if in this story we should take Ararat for Armenia.
†. XIII.
Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvel, that the same ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along, and even in India, be called Ararat.
†. XIV.
Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South-side of the Mountains Caucasi, and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the Soil.
†. XV.
The conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief Points.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Flood: and of the Sons of Noah; Sem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was repeopled.

§. I.
Whether Shem and Ham were elder than Japhet.
§. II.
Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World; as that all Histories must yield to Moses: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the known great Lords of the first Ages, were of the issue of Ham.
§. III.
Of the Isles of the Gentiles in Japhet's Portion: of Berosus his too speedy seating Gomer the Son of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhet's Sons Tubal in Spain: and of the Antiquity of Longinque Navigation.
§. IV.
Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mesech, seated first about Asia the less, out of Ezekiel, cap. 38. 39.
§. V.
Against the fabulous Berosus his Fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.
§. VI.
That Gomer also and his Son Togorma, of the Posterity of Japhet, were first seated about Asia the less: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe; and Northward into Sarmatia.
§. VII.
Of Javan the fourth Son of Japhet; and of Mesch, of Aram, and Mesech of Japhet.
§. VIII.
Of Ascanez and Riphath, the two elder Sons of Gomer.
Of the four Sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper Name, or for the Sea.
§. X.
That the Seat of Chush, the eldest Son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this Point.

†. I.
Of Josephus his Tale of an Æthiopess Wife to Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the Seat of Chush.
†. II.
A Dispute against the Tale of Josephus.
†. III.
Chush ill expounded for Æthiopia. Ezek. 29. 10.
†. IV.
Another place of Ezekiel, cap. 30. v. 9. in like manner mistaken.
†. V.
A place Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Æthiopia.
†. VI.
That upon the like mistaking, both Terhaka in the Story of Sennnacherib, and Zera in the story of Asa, are unadvisedly made Æthiopians.
†. VII.
A farther Exposition of the place. Esay 18. 1.
§. XI.
Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Ægypt.

†. I.
That Mizraim the chief Planter of Ægypt, and the rest of the Sons of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.
†. II.
Of the time, about which the Name of Ægypt began to be known: and of the Ægyptians Lunary years, which made their Antiquities seem the more fabulous.
†. III.
Of certain vain Assertions of the Antiquities of the Ægyptians.
†. IV.
Against Pererius; That it is not unlikely, but that Ægypt was peopled within two hundred years after the Creation; at least that both it, and the most part of the World, were peopled before the Flood.
†. V.
Of some other Reasons against the Opinion of Pererius.
†. VI.
Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. ult. whereupon Pererius grounded his Opinion.
†. VII.

†. VII.

A Concluſion, reſolving of that which is moſt likely, touching the Ægyptian Antiquities: with ſomewhat of Phut, another Son of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

§. XII.

Of the eleven Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

†. I.

OF the Bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the Names of his eleven Sons.

†. II.

Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

†. III.

Of the Jebuſites, and Amorites.

†. IV.

Of the Gergeſites, Hevites, and Harkites.

†. V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

§. XIII.

Of the Sons of Chuſh, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

†. I.

THat the moſt of the Sons of Chuſh were ſeated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabæans that robbed Job: and of the Queen that came to Salomon.

†. II.

Joſephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the iſſue of Chuſh, to have been ſeated in the Weſt Æthiopia, diſproved out of Ezekiel and Jeremy.

§. XIV.

Of the iſſue of Mizraim: and of the place of Jeremy, cap. 9. v. 7.

§. XV.

Of the iſſue of Sem.

†. I.

OF Elam, Aſſur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

†. II.

Of Aram, and his Sons.

†. III.

Of the diviſion of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the Sons of Heber, of the iſſue of Sem.

†. IV.

Of the Sons of Joctan, the other Son of Heber.

†. V.

Of Ophir, one of Joctan's Sons, and of Peru: and of that Voyage of Salomon.

†. VI.

Of Havilah the Son of Joctan, who alſo paſſed into the Eaſt Indies: and of Meſha, and Sepher, named in the bordering of the Families of Joctan: with a concluſion of this Diſcourſe touching the Plantation of the World.

CHAP. IX

Of the beginning and eſtabliſhing of Government.

§. I.

OF the proceeding from the firſt Government under the eldeſt of Families to Regal, and from Regal abſolute to Regal tempered with Laws.

§. II.

Of the three commendable ſorts of Government, with their oppoſites: and of the degrees of humane Society.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the firſt Kings.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vain vaunt thereof without Vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about thoſe times.

§. I.

THat Nimrod was the firſt after the Flood that reigned like Sovereign Lord: and that his Beginning ſeemeth to have been of juſt Authority.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three diſtinct Perſons.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Aſſur, built Ninivie: and that it is probable out of Eſay 23. 13. that Aſſur built Ur of the Chaldees.

§. IV.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

§. V.

That we are not to marvel how ſo many Kingdoms could be erected about theſe times: and of Vexoris of Ægypt; and Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affine unto it.

§. VII.

Of the worſhipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

§. VIII.

Of the Wars of Ninus: and laſtly of his War againſt Zoroaſter.

CHAP.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief Author of Magick Arts: and of divers kinds of Magick.

§. I.

THAT Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inventer of Astrologie, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

§. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned; though the Devil here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evil things under the name and colour of good things.

§. IV.

That Daniel's misliking Nabuchodonosor's condemning of the Magicians, doth not justifie all their practices.

§. V.

The abuse of things, which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.

§. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawful Magick.

§. VII.

Of divers ways by which the Devil seemeth to work his wonders.

§. VIII.

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the Devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable Buildings of Ninus: and of his Wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

§. I.

OF the magnificent Building of Ninivie by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis Reign.

§. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage, and Education: and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

§. IV.

Of her Expedition into India, and Death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus, built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramids of Ægypt.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the Second Book of the First Part of the HISTORY of the WORLD.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the Birth of Abraham: and of the use of this Question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

OF some of the Successors of Semiramis: with a brief transition to the question, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.

§. II.

A proposal of Reasons or Arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the Year 292 after the Flood, and not in the Year 352.

§. III.

The Answer to one of the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journy out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his Fathers Death.

§. IV.

The Answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth Year.

§. V.

The Answer to two more of the Objections, shewing that we may have certainty of Abraham's Age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Son: and that there was great cause, why in the Story of Abraham his two Brethren should be respected.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest Son of Terah.

§. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient Stories the more unprobable.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the Story of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the four Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the Son of Ninus.

§. X.

Of Arioch, another of the four Kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Cœlesyria, and Arabia Petræa.

§. XI.

Of Tidal, another of the four Kings.

§. XII.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

§. XIII.

That it is not unprobable, that the four Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves, and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the first Peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A Brief of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Ægypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

§. II.

That by the account of the Ægyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's Reign in Ægypt began in the Year after the Flood 191.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents; oft-times many under one King.

§. IV.

Of Cham, and his Son Mizraim, or Osiris.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris's Reign ended: and that Jacob came into Ægypt in the time of Orus, the Son of Osiris.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Ægyptius, Orus, and the two Sesostres, successively reigning after Mizraim, and of divers errors about the former Sesostris.

§. VII.

Of Busiris, the first oppressor of the Israelites: and of his Successor Queen Thermutis, that took up Moses out of the Water.

§. VIII.

Of the two Brethren of Queen Thermutis: and what King it was, under whom Moses was born: and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Ægypt.

§. I.

OF the time of Moses's Birth: and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Ægypt.

§. II.

Of divers Cities and Places in Ægypt, mentioned in this Story, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young Children in Ægypt: and of Moses his preservation and education.

§. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Ægypt; and the opinions of certain ancient Historians, of his War in Æthiopia; and of his Marriage there: Philo his judgment of his Pastoral life: and that of Pererius of the Books of Genesis, and Job.

§. V.

Of Pharaoh's pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so far as Succoth.

§. VI.

Of the Solary and Lunary Years: and how they are reconciled: with the form of the Hebrew Year, and their manner of intercalation.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the divers ways leading out of Ægypt.

§. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it self.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous; and not at a low ebb.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them: with a discourse of Laws.

§. I.

A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the Story, until the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the Battle with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming, who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given: with divers commendations of the invention of Laws.

§. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

§. V.

Of the definition of Laws, and of the Law Eternal.

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

§. VII.

Of the written Law of God.

§. VIII.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

Of the Moral, Judicial, and Ceremonial Law: with a Note prefixed, how the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

§. X.

A Proposal of nine other Points to be considered; with a touch of the five first.
§. XI.
Of the sixth Point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.
§. XII.
Of the rest of the Points proposed.
§. XIII.
Of the several Commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandments, but by our default.
§. XIV.
If there were not any Religion, nor Judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.
§. XV.
Of humane Law, written and unwritten.
§. XVI.
That only the Prince is exempt from humane Laws, and in what sort.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites, from the receiving of the Law to the Death of Moses.

§. I.
OF the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their Marches through the Wilderness; with a Note of the Reverence given to the Worship of God, in this ordering of their Troups.
§. II.
The Offerings of the twelve Princes: The Passover of the second year: The departing of Jethro.
§. III.
The Voyage from Horeb to Kades: the Mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning back to the Red Sea.
§. IV.
Of their unwillingness to return: with the punishment thereof: and of divers Accidents in the return.
§. V.
Of Moses's arrival at Zin Kades: and the Accidents while they abode there.
§. VI.
Of their compassing Idumæa, and travelling to Arnon the border of Moab.
§. VII.
Of the Book of the Battels of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Books mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.
§. VIII.
Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot: and of the Giants in those parts: and of Sehon and Og.
Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moses his Death.
§. X.
Observations out of the Story of Moses, How God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Ægypt: and of the Men of Renown in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Joshua: with the Summ of the History of Joshua.

§. I.
HOw the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have War, were divers ways (as it were) prepared to be their Enemies.
§. II.
Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Wars of the Israelites.

THE

THE LIFE OF Sr Walter Raleigh.

I Determine to write the Life, the Riſe, Fortunes and End of Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, his Memoires being certainly worthy to be tranſmitted to Poſterity, who hath been ſo ſucceſsfully induſtrious in retrieving the Actions of former Ages from the Ruines of Time, even in its very Infancy, in a well-compil'd, maſculine, and learned Hiſtory of the World. The Image of ſo great a Perſon ſhould not be quite loſt, though drawn in little, which deſerves to be pourtray'd by the greateſt Maſters of Policy, and with the boldeſt Touches. Indeed his Shadows cannot now well be left exact, ſeeing they muſt be taken ſo long after his Death; when Time hath defac'd his beſt Features, and ſhed Oblivion on the moſt beautiful of his Actions. Who follows Truth (as Sir Walter has wiſely remark'd) too near the heels, may have his teeth ſtruck out: and he that goes after her, oft loſeth her ſight, and himſelf too. Diſtance of time doth ſometimes, like ſome mediums, make the ſtreighteſt Actions ſeem crooked, and ſometimes gives them the advantage of Land-ſcapes, which appear taking and agreeable afar off, though when nearly ſearch'd, and pry'd into by a curious and intelligent Eye, they ſeem rude, harſh, and unpleaſant. We muſt therefore deſpair of a juſt and exact Account of him, unleſs we could by ſome Magick Power (as the Author of a Pamphlet has done, to terrifie and make Gondamore ſpeak the Truth) raiſe him from the Dead, and converſe a while with his Ghoſt. I ſhall however with what imperfect Clue our Hiſtories have bequeathed, trace him through the various Labyrinths of Fortune, and take a Proſpect of him in the ſeveral Scenes of Court and Camp, Peace and War, till I have followed him to the Scaffold, the place of his much lamented and unhappy End; keeping as near as I can a medium between Thoſe who in their Annals drive on with an implicit faith; and Thoſe, who to get the reputation of Obſervers and Men of Reach, ſteal into the private Receſſes of Princes, and diſrobe Majeſty it ſelf to find ſome Deformities; which Love to their Prince, and Intereſt of State ſhould cover; The beſt Vail for all deform'd Actions.

In his Preface to the Hiſtory of the World.

I find him born at a place, call'd Budely, or Budleigh, in the County of Devon, in an Houſe which his Family had long poſſeſt, call'd Hays: A County (as Mr. Camden has obſerv'd) renown'd among foreign Nations for the Valour of its Inhabitants in Sea-Services of all ſorts. That Spain thought ſo, Sir Francis Drake, with many others of that County, as well as our

In his Britannia.

Sir Walter, are very convincing Arguments.

That he was well deſcended, was never yet queſtioned, but by my Lord of Oxon, who indeed was wont to call him the Jack, and Upſtart. But theſe were words which only Envy and Emulation could extort, and every one very eaſily confute.

Indeed that he was a Gentleman, becauſe a Favourite, was no ill Argument amongſt the Politicians of thoſe Times, if we may believe a Secretary of State, who hath left this as a Maxim then, That the Queen through her whole Reign never was guilty of creation, never in her choice took into her Favour a mere New-Man, or a Mechanick.

Sir Rob. Naunton.

That he was but poor in the beginning ſeems not ſtrange, if we conſider him the youngeſt Brother, and the Fortunes of his Family much diminiſhed by the Generoſity (if not Prodigality) of his Anceſtors. But the wants of Fortune are often recompenc'd with the richer gifts of the Mind; Nature foreſeeing the diſability of his Eſtate, ſtock'd him with a larger portion of Senſe, bequeath'd him the fairer Patrimony of a faithful Memory, plauſible Tongue, ſtrong Wit, and ſolid Judgment.

But becauſe the natural Endowments of the Mind, though never ſo great, are capable of Advancement by the help of Education, he reſolv'd for one of the Univerſities. Oxon had the happineſs to own him, where I find him in Oriel Colledg. His ſlender Fortune, and his active Genius, always pointed with a reſtleſs Ambition, would not let him ſettle here, ſo that he could only (like a Spy) take a tranſient view of, or (like an haſty Enemy) make ſome incurſions and inrodes into thoſe parts of Learning, which he afterward conquered, and was entirely Maſter of.

Therefore that he might the better feed thoſe Hopes Ambition had kindled in his thoughts, and remove nearer to the Miſtreſs he courted; He reſolved for one of the Inns of Court, which he knew were always Places of Eſteem with the Queen, who would ſay, they fitted youth for the future. Here he ſpent his time, and improv'd himſelf in the intricate knowledge of our Laws, and in the ſtudies of all Manly and Real Accompliſhments.

But he ſtaid not long here neither; for Fate it ſeems would have him of the Sword firſt. Yet though he laid aſide his Gown, it was not with a deſign of never re-aſſuming it; for through the frequent Viciſſitudes of his whole Life, he challenged a Reputation amongſt the moſt Eminent Statesmen, being upon all Emergencies of Affairs conſulted, as one of the beſt Oracles of Government and Policy in his time. It's true he was never ſworn, for ſome Reaſons of State which Courts ſpread a Vail over, but was frequently called to Counſil. Through his Life he made good his Motto, Tam Marti, quam Mercurio: and it is ſtill a Queſtion, whether he was the better States-man or Souldier? incomparably excelling in both the Arts of Peace and War. To riſe by his Studies, probably his Condition and Ambition would not let him judge the ſpeedieſt courſe; much time and a conſiderable Fortune being often ſpent in climbing up the tedious ſteps of Preferment that way. He thought it more eaſie to fight, than talk himſelf into a Reputation. Active times, and a buſie War-like Princeſs, pointed him out the readieſt way to the Temple of Honour. The Sword he judged, with Alexander, the quickeſt Inſtrument to unty all the Knots and tedious Obſtacles of Greatneſs.

Nor could he want Occaſions enough to draw forth his Spirits into Action. France was engaged in a Civil War; And the Queen whether out of concern for the Proteſtants, or for Reaſon of State, to divert the Giant-Enemy the Spaniard, aſſiſted the poor diſtreſſed Dutch. And the Spaniard by a Policy of the ſame nature, raiſes Rebellions in Ireland; which like ſubterranean Fires, broke out over all that Kingdom at ſeveral times; When one Mac had in one place ſpent his Force, preſently we hear of the eruption of another. This Fire was kept in to the end of her Reign, being maintained by that laſting fewel of Rebellion, and common pretext of change in Government, RELIGION: the Pope pretending the Kingdom belonged to S. Peter.

Of his firſt Publick Appearance Mr. Camden hath given us this Account: The Queen though imbroil'd in a Rebellion at home of the Earl of Northumberland and Dacres in the North, yet failed not to relieve the Proteſtants in France, who were now brought into a diſtreſſed and almoſt deſperate condition; ſhe exhorted all the Proteſtant Princes to aſſiſt the Common Cauſe, ſupplied the Queen of Navarr with Money, taking Jewels in pawn; Permitted Henry Champernoun to carry into France a Troop of Gentlemen-Volunteers, who were reſolved to make good the Motto their Colours bore, Finem det nobis Virtus. Among theſe Sir Walter engaged himſelf, though (as Mr. Camden goes on) very young, and now firſt beginning to be of any note. So ſoon the early bloſſoms of his Valour began to appear, which afterwards grew up to an exact ripeneſs and perfection. France was the firſt School, wherein he learnt the Rudiments of War; and the Low-Countries and Ireland (the Military Academies of thoſe Times) made him Maſter of that Diſcipline; for in both places he he expoſed himſelf afterwards to Land-Service: But their ſlender Pay diſcouraged him from ſtaying long in either. The Service of Ireland eſpecially, ſcarce ſupplying the neceſſities of a Military Life.

Being reſtleſs and impatient of a narrow and low Condition, and his Services being not ſo ſucceſsful as his Hopes were great, and his Merits not anſwered with a Fortune ſtrong enough to buoy up his Reputation, he was reſolv'd to leave no Stone unturned, nor any Method of living unexperimented. And ſince his Land-Expeditions could make no Additions to his Fortunes, Novelty, and a deſire of putting himſelf into a better capacity, urg'd him to a Sea-Voyage. At both Sea and Land he was the true Pattern of Induſtry; and if any Man ever manag'd Neceſſity to its furtheſt Improvements, it was He. No expert Souldier or Mariner eſcap'd his Acquaintance or Enquiries; nothing that related to the Arts of War and Navigation miſs'd his peruſal: and one who was Maſter of thoſe parts he enjoy'd, could with no great difficulty make thoſe Arts his own. Add to this the Methods he uſed to improve himſelf: He ſlept but five hours; four he ſpent in reading and maſtering the beſt Authors, two in a ſelect Converſation and an Inquiſitive Diſcourſe, the reſt in Buſineſs. He underwent all the labours that attend a Souldier, and fared as the meaneſt. No common Mariner took more pains, or hazarded more in the moſt difficult Attempts.

What his Sea-Voyages produc'd, Hiſtories are ſilent in; but not long after his return I find him got again into Ireland, appearing with his own Colours flying in the Field, under the command of the 1580. Lord Grey, who ſucceeded Pelham in the Deputyſhip of that Kingdom. He had not been long there, before a Quarrel was rais'd between the Lord-Deputy and our Captain, (for with that Title he went into Ireland) which being complain'd of to a Council of War, was referr'd to the Council-Table in England. Our Hiſtorians would make the Lord Grey's Cauſe the faireſt; but Juſtice, and the Reſult of the Council, gave Raleigh the Victory. What were the occaſions of this Quarrel our Annals ſlip over, and have only left a large Field for Conjecture to tire it ſelf in. Whether an eager purſuit after Honour, without exact obedience to Military Command, occaſioned by a reſtleſs deſire of doing ſomething Great, or what ever elſe it might be, we leave the Reader to fancy: However if his Cauſe had not been good, no Apology, how well ſo ever manag'd, could have brib'd the Judgment of ſo wiſe a Council, wholly ſtrangers to his Worth and Perſon.

About this time Authors place the Æra of his Riſe, but cannot well agree about the occaſion of it. Some would have Leiceſter to be the chief Agent in it, and that he related the whole buſineſs at Council to the Queen with no little advantage to our Captain. Not ſo much probably out of reſpect to Raleigh, as to his own Intereſt. For Favourites, like their Princes, ſeldom eſpouſe any Cauſe upon any other ground than what advances or ſtands with their own Deſigns. His own Deſigns indeed on the Queen were blaſted, and finding the burden and envy of a Stateſman too heavy for his aged ſhoulders, he was willing handſomly to impart them to a more active Genius. Though great Favourites ſeldom admit of a Partner, till Age makes them willing to withdraw, and leave the trouble of Buſineſs to more ſpritely years. They care not to have new Plants ſet, till themſelves are almoſt wither'd and ſapleſs.

Others would have his Riſe attributed to Suſſex, who brought him to Court to outſhine Leiceſter, and eclipſe the ſplendor of his Enemy. But what was the ſtrongeſt Argument and only Perſwaſive with the Queen was his Merits, which ſhe ſoon ſaw, and preſently encouraged. Nor muſt I here paſs by one ſmall ſtep to his future Heighth, which our Chronicles have over-look'd, as below the Pen of an Hiſtorian, though ſome have judged an Account of ſome little tranſactions the beſt Inlets to Truth and Myſteries of State. The occaſion was thus: Our Captain coming over out of Ireland upon the aforemention'd Cauſe to Court, in very good habit, (which it ſeems was the greateſt part of his Eſtate) which is often found to be no mean Introducer where Deſerts are not known, found the Queen walking, till ſhe was ſtopt by a plaſhy-place which ſhe ſcrupled treading on; preſently he ſpread his new Plush-Coat on the Ground, on which the Queen gently trod, being not a little pleas'd, as well as ſurpris'd with ſo unexpected a Complement. Thus, as one remarks upon this Story, An Advantagious Admiſſion into the firſt Notices of a Prince, is more than half a degree to Preferment. For he preſently after found ſome gracious Beams of Favour reflecting on him, which he was reſolv'd, and well knew how to cheriſh and contract. To put the Queen in remembrance, he wrote in a Window obvious to her Eye, Fuller's Worthies.

Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall.

Which her Majeſty either eſpying, or being ſhewn, under-wrote this Anſwer,

If

If thy heart fail thee, climb not at all.

But his aſpiring Soul could not reſt in the lower, though ſafer way of living; He could not be mean, whoſe Reſolutions were ſo great, and whoſe Prudence and Activity made him capable of the higheſt Preferments. Inſpir'd with a reſtleſs and ambitious Genius, he deſign'd nothing but what was extreme; and had rather not be, than not be one of the moſt Eminent. And to the greateſt height probably he had arrived, had he lived in any other Princes Reigns than that of Queen Elizabeth and King James; the former being not over-haſty to raiſe any to any great Honour, and the latter not caring for Men of War and Blood.

Raleigh was ſo towardly an Apprentice in the Court-Trade, that he ſoon ſet up for himſelf, and would have improved this ſtock of favour to a great advantage, had he not loſt by thoſe common Enemies to it, Envy and Jealouſy. In a ſhort time he is become a Minion, obtains the Queen's Ear, is often conſulted, and nothing done without him. Her Favour and his Parts began to alarm his Rivals, who like ſome envious Neighbours will not eaſily permit any Fabrick to ſtand long that hinders their own Proſpect. Jealous Favourites, like wiſe Planters, will not ſuffer the Under-Wood to raiſe, which may obſtruct the growth of taller Trees.

Leiceſter began to repent his choice of his Creature, and thought he grew too faſt in his Miſtreſſes Favour. To ſtop the current of her Affection, he privately endeavours to undermine his Eſteem, and introduce a new Favourite that might be his Rival. To bring about this Deſign, Leiceſter thought there would be nothing wanting, if by Raleigh's abſence he could have opportunity to introduce the Earl of Eſſex; nor did he long expect before one offer'd it ſelf: for the Queen being willing to encourage Raleigh, (who, as Mr. Camden is pleaſed to tell us, was never ſufficiently to be commended for the great pains he took to diſcover remote Countries, and to advance the Glory of the Engliſh Navigation and Trade) ſent him on a Voyage to Sea. Nor did he make a vain and fruitleſs one; for at his Return he brought news of a new Country, diſcover'd by him in the Year 1584. called in honour of the Queen, Virginia, before call'd Wingandacoa by the barbarous Inhabitants. A Country that hath been ſince of no inconſiderable Profit to our Nation. But though Patents were granted to him to ſettle a Plantation there, it grew not famous till the Reign of King James: Wherein this Nation quickly found out the Excellency and Fruitfulneſs of the Place, ſo agreeable to our Engliſh Bodies, and profitable to the Exchequer. Nature there is prodigal, and makes amends for her parſimony to other parts of the World. An Acre there yieldeth often forty Buſhels of Corn; and, which is more ſtrange, there being three Harveſts in a Year: For, their Corn is ſow'd, ripe, and cut down in little more than two Months.

For this, and other beneficial Expeditions and Deſigns, this Year her Majeſty was pleas'd to confer on him the Honour of Knighthood, which in her Reign was more eſteemed than in her Succeſſors. The Queen keeping the Temple of Honour cloſe ſhut, and never open'd but to Vertue and Deſert. Nor was ſhe indeed ever haſty to reward; for ſhe ſeldom paid in any other Coin than Patents and good Words. So that the greateſt number of thoſe who might pretend to Favour, were the Architects of their own Fortunes, and had little or no Encouragement from her, more than that of a Spectator, who praiſes the Workmanſhip, and commends the handſom Contrivances of a Building, but is at no part of the Expences of raiſing it. Hence our Sir Walter's Rewards are quickly enumerated, for he got nothing after all his Exploits and Deſigns, but the Wardenſhip of the Stanneries, Command of the Guard, and the Government of Jerſey and Virginia; Places of no very great Profit, nor anſwerable to his Worth, or juſt Ambition. 1584.

In 1588, the grand Clymacterick of Spain, (for Bodies Politick have their Critical Times) I find Sir Walter by his Example encouraging others of the Gentry to ſet out Ships at their proper Charges, and by his admirable Conduct and Courage to put them to the beſt uſe. Which hired Ships were Actors of no ſmall uſe in that fatal Blow given to the Invincible Armada. Three Years this Giant had been growing to that portentous Greatneſs, with infinite Expences and Induſtry; but was beaten, ruin'd, and diſhonourably overthrown in leſs than a Months ſpace: the Spaniards finding that our Ships as well as the Heavens could fight againſt them. 1588.

But this Shock, like ſome Ague-fit, was eaſily recover'd, and in a ſhort time after the Spaniards began to renew their former Deſigns. For in the Parliament which began Febr. 19. 1592. I find Sir Walter Raleigh informing the Houſe, that the Queen could not without Subſidies prevent the eminent dangers threatned from the Spaniard. Of which Subſidies he ſpake (as he proteſted) not only to pleaſe the Queen, to whom he was infinitely oblig'd, but 1592.

but for the necessity he both saw and knew; He told them, he very well discovered the great Strength of the King of Spain; and to shew his Mightiness, he inform'd the house how he possest all the World. And that his Malice and ill purposes against this Realm might be evident, he shewed how on every side he had beleaguer'd us; In Denmark, the King being young, he had corrupted the Council and Nobility; so it was very likely he would speed himself of Ships from thence. In the Maritime Towns of the Low-Countries, and in Norway he hath laid in great store of Shipping. In France he hath the Parliament-Towns at command; In Britanny he hath all the best Havens; and in Scotland he hath corrupted the Nobility, and promis'd them Forces to assist the Papists, and that they were ready to joyn with any Foreign Aids, that would make them strong enough to be by themselves, and to resist others; for, as he thought, there were not six Gentlemen of that Country of one Religion. In his own Country there are all possible Preparations making, and he is coming with sixty Galleys besides other Shipping. If our Subsidies are not sudden, he may with ease invade us riding at Anchor; but all will be little enough to withstand him. At his coming he fully resolveth to get Plymouth, or at least to possess some of the Havens this Summer within our Land. And Plymouth is in most danger; for no Ordnance can be carried thither to remove him, the Passages will not give leave. Now the way to defeat him, is to send a Royal Army and supplant him in Britanny, and to possess our selves there; and to send a strong Navy to Sea, and to lie with it on the Cape, and at Lambuck; to which places come all his Ships with Riches from all places, and there they may set upon all that come.

What success this Speech alone had I know not, but the Subsidy was granted with the general Consent of the House, to carry on the War against Spain. His Expedition a little after demonstrates that the Queen took his Advice, which was to afflict the Spaniards at a distance; and whilst she could not handsomly assault his more neighbourly and guarded parts, to disturb those that were more naked and farther off, his Indies. The Moneys brought from thence being the Nerves and Sinews of his Power, and the chiefest Incendiary in the Irish Rebellion, which if handsomly stopt, would put an end to his Greatness, and humble the Mighty Monarch.

That he might not want an opportunity to shew his Valour and Conduct in this Affair, the Queen sends him to Sea to manifest both; thinking none more fit to be imploy'd in a Business, than the Person that counsell'd and started it; having the Courage of a Souldier to put in execution the sober Advices of the Gown-man. To America he is sent with 15 Men of War to possess himself of Panama, where the Spaniards ship their Riches, or to intercept them in their passage homewards. But he found more Encouragement from the willingness of the Seamen than from the Winds, which held the Ships in their Havens for three Months: A Circumstance which put an ill look upon the enterprize, and had almost made it vain. But nothing could allay the Courage of the Seamen, who were buoy'd up with the hopes of Prey, and the success of their Commander. Having set sail at last, they got beyond the Spanish Cape, called the Lands-end, where they met with unwelcome Intelligence, viz. That by expres command from his Catholick Majesty no Ship was to stir from the West-Indies that Year. Together with this News, instead of meeting with the long'd-for Enemy, they were attacq'd with a more invincible one, a furious Tempest, which disperst and disorder'd the Fleet, and sunk their Ship-Boats. Thus being on all sides assaulted with Tempests, Disasters, and the worse news of the Spaniards stay in the other World, he thought the Heavens had dash'd his Designs, and rendred a well-ordered Contrivance abortive. Upon which at first he intended to make for home with the whole Fleet; but another Project offer'd it self after second thoughts, of dividing the Navy into two Squadrons, from the hope that though while together they had been successless, yet Fortune might offer to them when separated something worthy their patience and desires. Immediately one Squadron is committed to the Conduct of Sir John Burroughs, Son to the Lord Burroughs; the other to Sir Martin Forbisher, with their respective Commissions. Sir Martin's charge was to lie off and on the Coast of Spain, to hinder the coming in of their Vessels. Sir John's to wait at the Azores for the coming of the Caracks out of the East-Indies.

Sir Walter was much blamed for this Action, and thought short in his Politicks, in giving over the hopeful part of the Design to Sir John Burroughs, and retiring himself to Court. But the Success was the only Argument of his Oversight, and nothing but the Event could charge him with Imprudence. The Division of the Fleet prov'd a wise Design, and amazed the Spaniard. For while the Spanish Admiral eyed Forbisher, the mighty Carracks were unregarded, and left to the mercy of Burrough's Men of War as an easie Prey. Who having ving according to Order arriv'd at Santa Cruce, a ſmall Town in the Iſle of Azores, a little after got ſight of a Portugal Merchant-man, (briskly purſued by a Privateer of the Earl of Cumberland's) but could not reach her, an unhappy Calm keeping him at too far a diſtance. But a more welcome Storm ariſing in the night, forc'd both to weigh Anchor. Aſſoon as day appear'd, the Portugees was unlading as faſt as ſhe could at Flores, and upon the approach of the Engliſh fired their Carack: But though their Deſigns were ruin'd as to that Ship, yet the news they got from ſome Priſoners taken, gave them freſh hopes, and heartned them with the Information, that ſeveral other Merchant-men were behind coming for Spain. This put Sir John Burroughs upon placing his Men of War at ſeveral diſtances to reach as far about as was poſſible. But they had not long waited, before their diligence was rewarded with the ſurpriſal of a large Veſſel, call'd The Mother of God, which was 165 foot long from Head to Stern, and ſeven Decks high, laden with Goods to the value of 150000 l. Engliſh, beſides what the Seamen privately took for their own uſe.

Sir Walter having now deſerted his Naval Employ, and become again a Courtier, it was not long before he was ſeiz'd with the idle Court-diſeaſe of Love, the unfortunate occaſion of the worſt Action of his 1595. whole Life. For in the Year 1595, I find him under a Cloud, baniſh'd the Court, and his Miſtreſſes Favour withdrawn, for devirginating a Maid of Honour. But why for this one Action he ſhould lie under the imputation of an Atheiſt, and from a ſingle crime get the denomination of a Debauch, is the Logick of none but the Vulgar. By the ſame reaſon the other Favourites of thoſe Times (Leiceſter, Cecil, and Eſſex) bid as fair for thoſe titles, the latter making the Parallel good in this Vice with his ſucceſſor Buckingham, though in other Circumſtances there was a great diſparity. Neither ever was it accounted any great Crime in the Orb of Courts. But to ſtop the Mouth of Fame, which is always open on ſuch occaſions, and to wipe out the Infamy of the Fact, he was ſhortly after married to the Object of his Love, the deflowred Lady. And to get Reputation among the People, who always were unjuſt to him in their ſentiments, he put himſelf on a Voyage to Guiana, for the Improvement and honour of his Country. Having therefore obtained his Liberty, (for, for this Action he was impriſoned ſome months) and finding all things with an unpleaſant Aſpect, he followed his Genius of diſcovering New Places, and tracing Nature in her more retired and hidden Paths; thinking that Abſence, and a Fortunate Voyage, might re-inveſt him in his Miſtreſſes thoughts, and merit a new Eſteem.

Guiana had been talk'd of much by the Spaniards as an excellent Country, and for one Commodity the Spaniards had a great reverence for, very famous Gold, which put Sir Walter upon the Attempt, judging it beſides a place (if maſter'd) very convenient for its ſituation to annoy and diſturb the Spaniards American Traffick, and would be no little help in Building his Fortunes, and what was more eſtimable, place him in his Miſtreſſes Favour again.

From Plymouth he ſet ſail on the ſixth of February, and on the 22d of March arriv'd at the Iſle of Trinidado, eight degrees on this ſide the Equinoctial-Line; where he ſoon made himſelf Maſter of S. Joſephs, a ſmall City; and, which was more conſiderable, of the Governour Antonio Bereo, from whom he got the beſt account of thoſe Parts, and its Trade. Leaving his Ship at Trinidado, with ſome Pinaces and an hundred Men, and the ſmall ſtock of Knowledge he obtain'd of Bereo, he made up the great River Ormus, in ſearch of Guiana. What he found, ſaw, and performed there, his moſt Ingenious Hiſtory of thoſe Parts may ſatisfie the Curious.

In his Return he fired Cumana, becauſe the Inhabitants would not redeem it with Money; beſides ſeveral Cottages at S. Maries, and Rio de la Hatch. Neither did he deſiſt in this Deſign of Guiana, for once or twice Mr. Cambden tells us afterwards he proſecuted it with vaſt Expences, although the Spaniards had plac'd a Colony at Trinidado to hinder his farther Attempts.

Whilſt Sir Walter is ſearching for a new World, Hawkins and Drake are attempting freſh Things in thoſe parts of America which the Spaniards were already poſſeſt of. But their old Fortune had left them, and the unhappineſs of the Action put an end to their Lives; In the Year 1596 both 1956.
died with Grief, and bequeath'd their Hatred of the Spaniard to Sir Walter Raleigh to revenge their Quarrel.

Who this Year return'd, being ſatisfi'd with his Expedition, and much more with the Reception he found at Court. The Storm was blown over, and his Miſtreſſes Brow was more ſmooth than at his departure; after his Eclipſe he ſhone brighter at Court, and the Death of thoſe two famous Sea-men, put them upon courting Sir Walter, whom the neceſſity of State forc'd them to cheriſh and encourage. It's ſtrange, that what was Eſſex's Ruine, ſhould confirm Sir Walter in Favour, frequent Abſence from his Miſtreſs. But Sir Walter's Obſequiouſneſs work'd much upon the humour of the Queen, who lov'd Pliantneſs, and exact Obedience, which Eſſex could not always counterfeit.

The

The Spaniard being encouraged with the poſſeſſion of Cales, from whence it was but a ſhort cut over into England, the Death of Hawkins, and their former ſcourge, Drake, and the earneſt ſolicitations of the Iriſh, (who through her Reign had got the Itch of Rebellion, which was fed and maintained by the Spaniard, though they had been ſufficiently blooded by the Engliſh;) And the Queen foreſeeing a Storm gathering, thought 'twas the beſt way to ſcatter it before it grew too great, and came too near. She reſolved therefore to begin with the Spaniard firſt, and fairly ſet on the Enemy in his own Ports. She ſpeedily riggs a brave Fleet, conſiſting of 150 Ships, Mann'd by 6360 Souldiers, 1000 Volunteer-Gentlemen, 6772 Sea-men. Robert Earl of Eſſex, and the Lord Howard were Commanders of equal Authority, having been both at an exceſſive charge in carrying on the War. To theſe were joyn'd a Council of War, conſiſting of ſeveral eminent Seamen and Souldiers, among whom was our Sir Walter. The Fleet was divided into four Squadrons; the firſt commanded by the Lord Admiral Howard; the ſecond by Eſſex; the third by Sir Thomas Howard; the fourth by Sir Walter Raleigh.

In the beginning of June they ſet ſail, and got to Gades the 20*th* their Deſign being perfectly unknown, as well to their Enemies as their own Men. Eſſex heated with Youth, and an ambition of doing bravely, would have preſently landed and aſſaulted the Enemy: but this heat was allayed and corrected by Sir Walter's Advice, who impugned all ſuch raſh Attempts. At laſt a fit Opportunity preſented it ſelf, and by all it was reſolv'd to fight them. At which News the Earl threw up his hat for joy. The Ebbing-Waters would not permit the great Ships to engage, the Shelves being of greater hazard than the Enemy. Therefore Raleigh is pitch'd on as the moſt proper Perſon in the midſt of the Channel to provoke them, who accordingly in a little Ship, called the Waſtſpight, directed his Prow againſt the Spaniſh Men of War, who thereupon preſently fell back. Upon this the reſt of the Fleet came in, and burnt and took ſeveral of their Ships. After this Victory at Sea, the Men were very importunate to go on ſhore, whom Eſſex landed at Puntal, a league from the City. At firſt the Spaniards received them with a great deal of Courage, but the Engliſh charged ſo warmly, that they thought it their prudenteſt way to retire with more ſpeed than they came out. The Engliſh purſued ſo cloſe that they had almoſt recover'd the City-Gates as ſoon as they. The Earl got upon a Bulwark near the Gate, and from thence he eſpied an Entrance into the Town, but very hazardous, it being down a very ſteep Precipice but this did not affright ſeveral of our Engliſh, who leap'd from thence into the Town, and engaged the Enemy in the Streets. In the mean time Sir Walter and others having forced the Gates, entred the Town, and the Caſtle was ſurrendred upon Merciful Conditions. But Sir Walter was not idle, or eager after the enjoyment of his Conqueſt; for whilſt others were reaping the plentiful Harveſt of War, he with ſome ſmall Ships who could paſs up the Chanel, fired their Merchant-Men which were withdrawn to Port-Real, although they offered two millions of Ducats for their Redemption. Great were the Loſſes to the Spaniards by this War; and if we may believe our Hiſtories, amounted to no leſs than Twenty Millions of Ducats. Upon Conſultation it was reſolv'd to quit the Town, though contrary to the Opinion of Eſſex, who was for keeping it, as a future Annoyance to the Spaniards. After this they took Faro in Algarbe; and being weary at laſt of their Victories, they reſolv'd for home, though much againſt Eſſex's will, whoſe youthful heat was but inflam'd by their Succeſſes, but was wiſely ſlack'd by the Prudence of the Admiral, and the ſober Advice of Sir Walter: who finding their Men ſick, and having gotten ſo ample Rewards, were not again for hazarding their Fortune upon hopes of a future Prey.

At their Return the Queen welcom'd and encourag'd her Souldiers with new Honours. All but Eſſex were pleaſed, who found State-Preferments not diſpos'd of according to his mind. Vere was made Governour of the Briel, and Sir Robert Cecil Secretary of State.

To recover their Loſſes at Gades, the Spaniard riggs out a new Fleet, which were baffled alone by the Winds; for the greateſt part were caſt away and wreck'd. With the Reliques of this Fleet; in the Year following I find him upon his old Deſigns of Ireland: But the Queen was always too nimble for the grave Don whoſe Deſigns, like his Ships, mov'd ſlow and heavy.

Twenty Ships were rigg'd out at preſent, and afterwards encreaſed to an hundred and twenty Men of War and Victuallers; five thouſand Men rais'd, beſides a thouſand old Souldiers brought from the Netherlands by Vere. To appeaſe Eſſex, the whole Conduct of the Expedition is committed to him. The Navy was divided into three Squadrons; The firſt led by Eſſex himſelf; The ſecond by Howard; The third by Sir Walter, who now was eſteemed the ableſt Seaman of his Age. To ennoble this Expedition, ſeveral Perſons of quality of all ſorts engag'd themſelves, who look'd rather like Courtiers than Souldiers, 1597.

being more adorn'd with Feathers and gay Cloaths, than arm'd with Courage and Reſolution. On the ninth of July they ſet out with theſe Inſtructions, viz. To ſteer to Farol and the Groine, to ſurprize the Spaniards in their Harbours, and to intercept their Indian Fleet (the Bait of the War) at the Azores. Which Deſign was built upon very good Maximes of State: For it would hinder the Fleet intended againſt England; Their Merchant-men wanting Convoys, might be ſeized on; The Azores won, (where the Indian Fleet always call'd for freſh Water in their Return); the Queen have the Dominion of the Seas, and the Spaniard be obliged to a Treatment of Peace. Eſſex gave out that he was reſolv'd to ſacrifice Himſelf and the Navy for his Country: But his brisk Reſolutions were quickly daunted by a diſmal Tempeſt, which aſtoniſh'd the Mariners themſelves, and forc'd home our gaudy Volunteers, who thought no Enemy ſo terrible as a Tempeſt, and the ſevere motions of a Sea-ſick ſtomach. Thus by this Contradiction of Heaven their Ships were torn, their Victuals ſpent, and they upon this Emergency forc'd to a Conſultation what to do. Some were for laying aſide the Farol and the Groine Attempts; others for a Voyage to the Azores, which was contradicted by Vere. So that at laſt Eſſex and Raleigh were pitch'd on to ride Poſt for Advice to the Queen. Eſſex talkt to the Queen of ſtrange Chimera's; how that if he were permitted to have the Fleet, he would with eaſe fire the Spaniſh Navy, and perform many other bold Deſigns; about which the Queen caution'd him, and deſir'd the whole Buſineſs ſhould be managed as their joynt diſcretion ſhould prompt, and opportunity offer it ſelf. But if it were poſſible, if any occaſion courted them to it, they ſhould fire the Ships in Farol Haven, and intercept what other Ships they could from the Indies; And upon all Occaſions manifeſt their Conduct and Valour. With theſe Inſtructions they ſet ſail again from Plymouth, (whither they were returned the ſeventeenth of Auguſt) but were ſeparated by a Tempeſt near the Lands-end. A croſs Yard in Raleigh's Ship was broken by the impetuouſneſs of the Storm, and fell, which forc'd him to ſtay behind to make it good; And having been falſly inform'd that the Spaniſh Fleet was bound for the Azores, after having repaired his Ship, he ſteer'd his courſe thitherwards. In the mean time Eſſex's Jealouſie, and the pernicious Inſinuations of Raleigh's Enemies, had wrought him into a belief that this Diviſion of the Navy was on purpoſe laid and fore-deſign'd by Raleigh: But however the buſineſs was put up at his arrival, and Eſſex welcom'd him, making an Apology for acquainting the Queen with the Diviſion falſly repreſented, and built (as it appear'd) on wrong ſuppoſitions.

Here wanting Water, Sir Walter landed without leave, and ſcarce had taken in Water before he received Orders immediately to follow Eſſex to Fayal, whither he repaired: but not finding Eſſex there according to his Order, he ſpent his time in taking an exact ſurvey of the Haven, and of the People there, who from the fear and apprehenſion of what followed, were haſtily packing away their Goods. This fair Opportunity, upon Conſultation, puts him upon taking the Town, and egg'd on the Souldiers in hopes of an ample Prey. Sir Gilly Merrick (one of Eſſex his Creatures) diſſwaded Sir Walter from the Deſign, alledging it would rob the Earl of the honour of taking it, and ſo confirm him his Enemy. But Sir Walter's deſire of Glory, and the Souldiers Avarice, urg'd him (after he had ſtaid ſome time for Eſſex's Arrival) to the Aſſault of the Place, which was at laſt taken. The next day after this Exploit Eſſex arrived at Fayal, where he was quickly inform'd of what Raleigh had done, and that the whole buſineſs was tranſacted with no other deſign than to rob him of the Glory, which his Jealouſie made him eaſily believe.

Some perſwaded the Earl to try Sir Walter by a Council of War, and Caſhier him; others without more a do would have him put to Death, for landing without Orders: At laſt ſome of Raleigh's Officers were Caſhier'd, He himſelf frown'd on, and ſeverely reprov'd by Eſſex. But he never wanted an Apology for his Ambition; inſtancing that he was not obliged to the Orders the inferiour Officers and Souldiers were, that the Commiſſion did not reach Him; being one of the three Generals; Moreover, that he ſtaid for him four days; and that he was neceſſitated at laſt to land, being in extreme want of Water, which was not to be had without fighting. However, the Lord Howard became his Mediator, and perſwaded him to an honourable ſubmiſſion; which was perform'd, and accepted of; and thereupon both himſelf and the caſhier'd Officers and Souldiers were again admitted into favour. But this was only laying their Paſſions aſleep a while, which in the ſequel of our ſtory were again awaken'd. I cannot here omit a ſpeech of the Earls upon this occaſion, (which Sir Henry Wotton calls a Noble Word) who being urged to put Sir Walter on Martial Law: That I would do, ſaid he, if he were my Friend.

However, this Expedition was not ſo glorious and great as at firſt they hoped it might have been. For after burning the Town, and taking Flores, Gratioſa, and Villa Franca in S. Michaels, with three American rican Spaniſh Ships, together with the burning of a Carack, they came home much torn, leaky, and weather-beaten, about the end of October. This Expedition was commented on variouſly by the People, who were ſtrangely carried on with a blind Paſſion for Eſſex, and ſo very prone to miſconſture Raleigh's Actions, from a Prejudice they had entertain'd, that becauſe he was not Eſſex's friend, he muſt be an Enemy to his Country. However, the Queen look'd on him with another eye, and he grew faſter in her favour than his Rival, who from this time began rather to decline, by a fault Sir Walter was afterwards guilty of, inſatiable Ambition; a Principle that put him on thoſe Practices which brought him afterwards to the Block. Eſſex was incens'd that Sir Robert Cecil, Raleigh's Friend, was preferr'd in his abſence. And becauſe the Earl's Concerns are woven amongſt Sir Walter's, it will not be impertinent to give ſome Account of him here.

Eſſex was arrived to the heighth of Favour, and might have ſtaid there, had he taken his meaſures aright; had he own'd an Obſequiouſneſs to the Queen, or been Maſter of the great Requiſite in a Courtier, Diſſimulation; but it was a part of his Character to be a great Reſenter, and a weak Diſſembler of the leaſt Diſgrace. His Ireland Tranſactions were ill conſtrued, and his Miſcarriages nicely diſſected by the curious Eyes of thoſe State-Anatomiſts, the Lord-Treaſurer Buckhurſt, the Lord-Admiral Nottingham, and his mortal Enemy Secretary Cecil, who began to remove him out of that Favour he had long poſſeſt. But it was true, as the Earl of Clarendon has obſerv'd, "That though he was Rival'd by a "ſtrong and ſubtile Faction, which cared, "conſulted for his Ruine; yet the Danger "was thus allayed, that they were all his "publick and profeſſed Enemies, and ſo "known to the Queen, that they durſt ne"ver impertinently urge ought againſt him, "ſince they were ſure that Malice was con"cluded, when the Reaſon of their Objecti"on haply might not be conſidered.

However, in 1601 the Earl drew near his Ruine: for being hurried on by Cuffs ill Counſel and his own Diſcontents, he projects new Plots againſt the State, and tampers with the King of Scots to remove his Enemies at Court by force, informing him that the Power of the Nation lay in their hands, Raleigh being Governour of Jerſey, &c. and other of his Enemies having the ſtrength of the Nation at their command. And vainly preſuming upon the Love of the Citizens, he projects to ſeize the Court, and ſecure Raleigh, as the moſt conſiderable Enemy he had. Of which Deſigns Gorges informs Sir Walter. The better to carry on his deſigns, Eſſex goes into London, where he endeavour'd to excite the Citizens to an Inſurrection: But the City then being Rich, was not ſo apt to rebel; Rebellion being uſually the Daughter of Poverty and Diſcontent. For theſe Treaſonable Actions, being found guilty, he was condemned and executed.

That he died bravely and like a Gentleman, is not to be queſtion'd; but that Sir Walter Raleigh ſhould come openly to ſee him dye on purpoſe only to fat his Eyes with the Sacrifice of his Enemy, can never be granted, if we may believe himſelf in the ſame circumſtances on the Scaffold, where he told his Auditors on the words of a Dying-man, he only came there to defend himſelf if any thing had been urg'd againſt him by the Earl.

Thus ended that Favourite, whoſe Death ſtruck a damp on the Queens proſperous days, and gave blackneſs to her declining Reign. This Blow, like that of Gunpowder, not only blew up his Friends and Neighbours, but ſhook his Enemies at a diſtance; for it reach'd Sir Walter too, who wanting ſtrength to grapple with his Rival the Treaſurer, and not owning humility enough to be his Servant, periſh'd at laſt in the Encounter. This himſelf preſag'd (if we may believe Oſborn) as he came from the Execution of Eſſex, in a Boat, when he was heard to ſay, That it was more ſafe to have many Enemies at Court of equal power, than one falſe and ambitious Friend who hath attain'd to the abſoluteneſs of Command.

The Queen could not long ſurvive her Favourite; for I find her Death to be the next year following. A Queen who had enrich'd the Nation, reform'd Religion, curb'd the Pride of Spain, ſupported France, preſerv'd Scotland, protected the Hollander againſt the Spaniard, and had vanquiſh'd his Armies by Sea and Land, reduc'd Ireland to obedience notwithſtanding all the ſubtil practices of Spain, and open Aſſiſtance given in Arms to her Iriſh Rebels; with many other things, which might ſeem too much to be the Atchievements of one Reign.

King James her Succeſſor came to the poſſeſſion of a Kingdom arrived at the heighth of Proſperity, which like other Bodies when they are at their Ἀκμὴ tend to Corruption, and degenerate. This Sir Walter perceiv'd, and would have (as he thought) remedied. Sir John Forteſcue, the Lord Cobham, Sir Walter, and others, would have obliged the King by Articles before his coming to the Crown, that his Country-mens number ſhould be limited: But this was ſtopt by the prudent Treaſurer, and the bold Northumberland. Sir Walter fear'd that the Scots, like Locuſts, would quickly devour this Kingdom; it being probable that (like the Goths and Vandals) they 1603.

would ſettle in any Country rather than their own, and would make it their buſineſs to render our Nation as poor as their own: for this, he, with the reſt of them, was afterwards frown'd on by the King, and loſt his Command of the Guards.

However, Sir Walter ſtill purſued the Good and Glory of his Country; and as formerly in Active Times, gave his Advice againſt the Peace with Spain, which might now with no great difficulty be brought on its knees. At the entrance of the King he preſented him with a Manuſcript of his own writing, with no weak Arguments againſt the Peace. But Sir Walter was miſtaken; for his Counſel was ill tim'd, and a new Part was now to be acted, the Scene being changed. Peace was the King's Aim, whether out of Fear, or Religious Principles I determine not. But with Spain a Peace is concluded, with an Enemy already humbled, who now had time given them to recover their former Loſſes, and were as it were cheriſh'd to aſſault us with the greater vigour: which how true it proved, every Man can tell. And as if the King would quite run counter to the Queens Politicks, the Eſtates of the Netherlands are deſpiſed, ſlighted, and deſerted, under pretence that it was of ill example for a Monarch to protect them.

The King is hardly warm in his Throne, but there is a great noiſe of a Plot, generally call'd Sir Walter Raleigh's Treaſon; but upon what Grounds I know not, ſince he had the leaſt hand in it, as by his Tryal will appear. A Plot that is ſtill a Myſtery, and hath a Vail ſpread over it; A Plot compos'd of ſuch a Hodgpodg of Religion and Intereſts, that the World ſtands amazed Sir Walter Raleigh ſhould ever be drawn into it; A Plot ſo unlikely to hurt others, or benefit themſelves, that as Osborn tells us, If ever Folly was capable of the title, or Pity due to Innocence, theirs might claim ſo large a ſhare, as not poſſibly to be too ſeverely condemn'd, or ſlightly enough puniſhed. Envy and Diſdain, as Sir Walter has told us in his Remains, ſeek Innovation by Faction. Diſcontent is the great Seducer, which at firſt put him to ſearch into a Plot, he afterwards was betray'd into. The chief Ingredients in this Medley were two Prieſts, Watſon and Clerk, and Count Aremberg, Ambaſſador Extraordinary for the Arch-Duke, who brought in Cobham, and he his Brother George Brook, both Proteſtants, at leaſt ſeeming ſo; George Brook hook'd in Parham and others, and they the Lord Grey of Wilton, a rank Puritan; then came in Sir Walter, the wiſeſt of them all according to Sanderſon, who as he tells us, dallied like a Fly in the flame till it conſum'd him. Willing he was to know it, and thought by his Wit to over-reach the Confederates, whom he knew well enough, though he dealt with none but Cobham, as I can find out. One Mr. Lawrency an Antwerp-Merchant, was the property made uſe of by Arembergh, and a Crony of the Lord Cobham's. Theſe carried on the Contrivance a long while, which (as Sanderſon tells us) was betray'd by Lawrency, and the vigilancy of Cecil. And indeed it was morally impoſſible that ſo many diſagreeing weak Souls ſhould carry on a Project without taking Air; the leaſt glimpſe being enough to give light to the States-men of thoſe times. Their Deſigns were,

1. To ſet the Crown on the Lady Arabella; or to ſeize the King, and make him grant their Deſires, and a Pardon.
2. To have a Toleration of Religion.
3. To procure Aid and Aſſiſtance from Foreign Princes.
4. To turn out of the Court ſuch as they diſlik'd, and place themſelves in Offices.

Watſon to be Lord-Chancellor.
George Brook Lord-Treaſurer.
Sir Griffin Markham Secretary of State.
Lord Grey Maſter of the Horſe, and Earl-Marſhal of England.

But it ſeems they made no proviſion for Sir Walter; which is no inconſiderable Argument of his Innocency, who could have deſerv'd, and might have expected as great a Reward as any of them, had he been engaged in the Plot.

To oblige to Secrecy, Watſon draws up an Oath. But all is betray'd; they are ſeiz'd, examin'd, and try'd. How well or ill Sir Walter has acquitted himſelf, we ſhall leave to the Opinion of the Readers of the following TRYAL, which was exactly and faithfully taken.

THE

THE ARRAIGNMENT OF Sr Walter Raleigh, Knight.

AT Winton, Thurſday the 17th of November, Anno Dom. 1603, before the Right Honourable, the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Devon.
Lord Henry Howard.
Lord Cecil, Earl of Salisbury.
Lord Wotton.
Sir John Stanhope, Vice-Chamberlain.
Lord Chief-Juſtice of England, Popham.
Lord Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, Anderſon.
Juſtice Gaudie.
Juſtice Warburton, and Sir William Wade Commiſſioners.

Firſt, The Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer was read by the Clerk of the Crown-Office; and the Priſoner bid hold up his Hand.

And then preſently the INDICTMENT was in effect as followeth:

THAT he did Conſpire, and go about to deprive the King of his Government; to raiſe up Sedition within the Realm; to alter Religion, to bring in the Roman Superſtition, and to procure Foreign Enemies to invade the Kingdoms. That the Lord Cobham, the ninth of June laſt, did meet with the ſaid Sir Walter Raleigh in Durham-Houſe, in the Pariſh of St. Martins in the Fields, and then and there had Conference with him, how to advance Arabella Stuart to the Crown and Royal Throne of this Kingdom; and that then and there it was agreed, that Cobham ſhould treat with Aremberg, Embaſſador from the Arch-Duke of Auſtria, to obtain of him 600000 Crowns, to bring to paſs their intended Treaſons. It was agreed that Cobham ſhould go to the Arch-Duke Albert, to procure him to advance the pretended Title of Arabella: from thence knowing that Albert had not ſufficient means to maintain his own Army in the Low-Countries, Cobham ſhould go to Spain to procure the King to aſſiſt and further her pretended Title.

It was agreed, the better to effect all this Conſpiracy, that Arabella ſhould write three Letters, one to the Arch-Duke, another to the King of Spain, and a third to the Duke of Savoy, and promiſe three things: Firſt, to eſtabliſh firm Peace between England and Spain. Secondly, To tolerate the Popiſh and Roman Superſtition. Thirdly, To be ruled by them in contracting of her Marriage.

And for the effecting theſe Traiterous Purpoſes, Cobham ſhould return by the Iſle of Jerſey, and ſhould find Sir Walter Raleigh Captain of the ſaid Iſle there, and take Counſel of Raleigh for the diſtributing of the aforeſaid Crowns, as the Occaſion or Diſcontentment of the Subjects ſhould give cauſe and way.

And

And further, That Cobham and his Brother Brook met on the 9th of June laſt, and Cobham told Brook all theſe Treaſons: To the which Treaſons Brook gave his Aſſent, and did joyn himſelf to all theſe; and after on the Thurſday following, Cobham and Brook did ſpeak theſe words: That there would never be a good World in England, till the King (meaning our Soveraign Lord) and his Cubs (meaning his Royal Iſſue) were taken away.

And the more to diſable and deprive the King of his Crown, and to confirm the ſaid Cobham in his Intents, Raleigh did publiſh a Book, falſly written againſt the moſt juſt and Royal Title of the King, knowing the ſaid Book to be written againſt the juſt Title of the King; which Book Cobham after that received of him. Further, for the better effecting theſe Traiterous Purpoſes, and to eſtabliſh the ſaid Brook in his Intent, the ſaid Cobham did deliver the ſaid Book unto him the 14th of June. And further, the ſaid Cobham, on the 16th of June, for accompliſhment of the ſaid Conference, and by the Traiterous Inſtigation of Raleigh, did move Brook to incite Arabella to write to the three forenamed Princes, to procure them to advance her Title; and that ſhe, after ſhe had obtained the Crown, ſhould promiſe to perform three things, viz. Peace between England and Spain. 2. To tolerate with impunity the Popiſh and Roman Superſtitions. 3. To be ruled by them three in the contracting of her Marriage.

To theſe Motions the ſaid Brook gave his Aſſent. And for the better effecting of the ſaid Treaſons, Cobham on the ſeventeenth of June, by the Inſtigation of Raleigh, did write Letters to Count Aremberg, and did deliver the ſaid Letters to one Matthew de Lawrency, to be delivered to the ſaid Count: which he did deliver for the obtaining of the 600000 Crowns; which Money by other Letters Count Aremberg did promiſe to perform the payment of; and this Letter Cobham received the eighteenth of June. And then did Cobham promiſe to Raleigh, that when he had received the ſaid Money, he would deliver 8000 Crowns to him: to which motion he did conſent; and afterwards Cobham offered Brook, that after he ſhould receive the ſaid Crowns, he would give to him 10000 thereof; to which Motion Brook did aſſent.

To the Indictment Sir Walter Raleigh pleaded Not Guilty.

Sir Walter Raleigh Priſoner, was asked, whether he would take Exceptions to any of the Jury?

Raleigh. I know none of them; they are all Chriſtians, and honeſt Gentlemen, I except againſt none.

E. Suff. You Gentlemen of the Kings Learned Counſel, follow the ſame courſe as you did the other day.

Raleigh. My Lord, I pray you I may anſwer the Points particularly as they are delivered, by reaſon of the weakneſs of my memory and ſickneſs.

Popham, Chief Juſtice. After the Kings Learned Counſel have delivered all the Evidence, Sir Walter, you may anſwer particularly to what you will.

Heale, the Kings Serjeant at Law. You have head of Raleigh's Bloody Attempts to kill the King and his Royal Progeny, and in place thereof to advance one Arabella Stuart: The particulars of the Indictment are theſe. Firſt, That Raleigh met with Cobham the ninth of June, and had Conference of an Invaſion, of a Rebellion, and an Inſurrection, to be made by the King's Subjects, to depoſe the King, and to kill his Children, poor Babes that never gave offence: Here is Blood, here is a new King and Governour. In our King conſiſts all our Happineſs, and the true uſe of the Goſpel, a thing which we all wiſhed to be ſetled after the Death of the Queen. Here muſt be money to do this, for Money is the Sinew of War. Where ſhould that be had? Count Aremberg muſt procure it of Philip King of Spain, five or ſix hundred thouſand Crowns, and out of this Sum Raleigh muſt have eight thouſand. But what is that Count Aremberg? though I am no good Frenchman, yet it is as much as to ſay in Engliſh, Earl of Aremberg. Then there muſt be Friends to effect this: Cobham muſt go to Albert Arch-Duke of Auſtria, for whom Aremberg was Ambaſſador at that time in England. And what then? He muſt preſwade the Duke to aſſiſt the pretended

tended Title of Arabella. From thence Cobham muſt go to the King of Spain, and perſwade him to aſſiſt the ſaid Title. Since the Conqueſt there was never the like Treaſon. But out of whoſe Head came it? Out of Raleigh's, who muſt alſo adviſe Cobham to uſe his Brother Brook to incite the Lady Arabella to write three ſeveral Letters, as aforeſaid in the Indictment; all this was on the ninth of June. Then three days after Brook was acquainted with it: After this Cobham ſaid to Brook, It will never be well in England till the King and his Cubs are taken away. Afterwards Raleigh delivered a Book to Cobham, treacherouſly written againſt the Title of the King. It appears that Cobham took Raleigh to be either a God, or an Idol. Cobham endeavours to ſet up a new King, or Governour. God forbid mine Eyes ſhould ever ſee ſo unhappy a change. As for the Lady Arabella, ſhe upon my Conſcience hath no more title to the Crown than I have, which before God I utterly renounce. Cobham a Man bred in England, hath no experience abroad: but Raleigh, a Man of great Wit, Military, and a Sword-Man. Now whether theſe things were bred in a hollow Tree, I leave to them to ſpeak of, who can ſpeak far better than my ſelf. And ſo ſat him down again.

Sir Edward Cook, the King's Attorney.

I muſt firſt, my Lords, before I come to the Cauſe give one Caution, becauſe we ſhall often mention Perſons of eminent Places, ſome of them great Monarchs: Whatever we ſay of them, we ſhall but repeat what others have ſaid of them; I mean the Capital Offenders in their Confeſſions: We profeſſing Law, muſt ſpeak reverently of Kings and Potentates. I perceive theſe honourable Lords, and the reſt of this great Aſſembly, are come to hear what hath been ſcattered upon the Wrack of Report. We carry a juſt Mind, to condemn no Man but upon plain Evidence. Here is Miſchief, Miſchief in ſumma Gradu, exorbitant Miſchief. My Speech ſhall chiefly touch theſe three Points; Imitation, Supportation, and Defence.

The Imitation of Evil ever exceeds the Precedent; as on the contrary Imitation of Good ever comes ſhort. Miſchief cannot be ſupported but by Miſchief; yea, it will ſo multiply, that it will bring all to confuſion. Miſchief is ever underprop'd by Falſhood of foul Practices. And becauſe all theſe things did concur in this Treaſon, you ſhall underſtand the Main, as before you did the Bye.

The Treaſon of the Bye, conſiſteth in theſe Points: Firſt, That the Lord Grey, Brook, Markham, and the reſt, intended by Force in the Night to ſurprize the King's Court: which was a Rebellion in the Heart of the Realm, yea in the Heart of the Heart, in the Court. They intended to take him that is a Sovereign, to make him ſubject to their Power, purpoſing to open the Doors with Muſquets and Calievers, and to take alſo the Prince and Council. Then under the King's Authority to carry the King to the Tower; and to make a Stale of the Admiral. When they had the King there, to extort three things from him: Firſt, A Pardon for all their Treaſons. Secondly, A Toleration of the Roman Superſtition: Which, their Eyes ſhall ſooner fall out than they ſhall ever ſee; for the King hath ſpoken theſe words in the hearing of many, I will loſe the Crown, and my Life, before ever I will alter Religion. And, Thirdly, To remove Counſellors: In the room of the Lord Chancellor, they would have plac'd one Watſon a Prieſt, abſurd in Humanity, and ignorant in Divinity. Brook, of whom I will ſpeak nothing, Lord-Treaſurer. The great Secretary muſt be Markham, Oculus Patriæ. A Hole muſt be found in my Lord Chief Juſtice's Coat. Grey muſt be Earl-Marſhal, and Maſter of the Horſe, becauſe he would have a Table in the Court: marry, he would advance the Earl of Worceſter to an higher Place. All this cannot be done without a Multitude. Therefore Watſon the Prieſt tells a Reſolute Man that the King was in danger of Puritans and Jeſuites; ſo to bring him in blindfold into the Action, ſaying, That the King is no King till he be Crown'd; therefore every Man might right his own Wrongs: but he is Rex natus, His Dignity deſcends as well as yours, my Lords. Then Watſon impoſeth a blaſphemous Oath, That they ſhould ſwear to defend the King's Perſon; to keep ſecret what was given them in charge, and ſeek all ways and means to advance the Catholick Religion. Then they intend to ſend for the Lord Mayor and the Aldermen, in the King's Name, to the Tower, leſt they ſhould make any Reſiſtance, and then to take Hoſtages of them; and to enjoyn them to provide for them Victuals and Munition. Grey, becauſe the King removed before Midſummer, had a farther reach, to get a company of Sword-men to aſſiſt the Action: Therefore he would ſtay till he had obtained a Regiment from Oſtend, or Auſtria. So you ſee theſe Treaſons were like Sampſon's Foxes, which were joyned in their Tails, though their Heads were ſevered.

Raleigh.

Raleigh. You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray remember I am not charged with the Bye, being the Treason of the Priest.

Attourney. You are not. My Lords, you shall observe three things in the Treasons: First, They had a Watch-word (the King's safety) their Pretence was Bonum in se, their Intent was Malum in se. Secondly, They avouched Scripture; both the Priests had Scriptum est; perverting and ignorantly mistaking the Scriptures. Thirdly, They avouched the Common Law, to prove that he was no King till he was Crowed; alledging a Statute of Eliz. 13. This, by way of Imitation, hath been the course of all Traytors.

In the 20th of Edw. the 2*d*, Isabella the Queen, and the Lord Mortimer, gave out, That the King's Person was not safe, for the good of the Church and Common-wealth.

The Bishop of Carlile did preach on this Text, My Head is grieved: meaning by the Head, the King; that when the Head began to be negligent, the People might reform what is amiss.

In the 3*d Hen.* 4. Sir Roger Claringdon accompanied with two Priests, gave out, that Richard the Second was Alive when he was Dead.

Edward the 3*d* caused Mortimer's Head to be cut off, for giving counsel to Murther the King.

The 3 Hen. 7. Sir Henry Stanly found the Crown in the Dust, and set it on the King's Head; when Fitzwater and Garret told him that Edward the 5*th* was alive, he said, If Ibe alive, I will assist him. But this cost him his Head.

Edmond de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk, killed a Man in the Reign of King Henry the 7*th*, for which the King would have him hold up his hand at the Bar, and then Pardoned him. Yet he took such an Offence thereat, that he sent to the Noblemen, to help to reform the Common-wealth; and then said, he would go to France, and get Power there. Sir Roger Compton knew all the Treason, and discovered Windon and others, that were Attainted.

He said there was another thing that would be stood upon, namely, that they had but one Witness. Then he vouched one Appleyard's Case, a Traytor in Norfolk, who said a Man must have two Accusers. Helms was the Man that accused him; but Mr. Just. Catlin said, that that Statute was not in force at that day. His words were [Thrust her into the Ditch.] :

Then he went on speaking of Accusers, and made this difference: An Accuser is a speaker by Report, when a Witness is he that upon his Oath shall speak his knowledge of any Man.

A third sort of Evidence there is likewise, and this is held more forcible than either of the other two; and that is, when a Man by his Accusation of another, shall by the same Accusation also condemn himself, and make himself liable to the same Fault and Punishment: this is more forcible than many Witnesses. So then so much by way of Imitation. Then he defined Treason; there is Treason in the Heart, in the Hand, in the Mouth, in Consummation: comparing that in Corde to the Root of a Tree; in Ore, to the Bud; in Manu, to the Blossom; and that which is in Consummatione, to the Fruit.

Now I come to your Charge, you of the Jury. The greatness of Treason is to be considered in these two things, Determinatione finis, and Electione mediorum. This Treason excelleth in both, for that it was to destroy the King and his Progeny. These Treasons are said to be Crimen læsæ Majestatis; this goeth further, and may be term'd Crimen extirpandæ Regiæ Majestatis, & totius Progeniei suæ. I shall not need, my Lords, to speak any thing concerning the King, nor of the Bounty and Sweetness of his Nature, whose Thoughts are Innnocent, whose Words are full of Wisdom and Learning, and whose Works are full of Honour; although it be a true saying, Nunquam nimis quod nunquam satis. But to whom do you bear your Malice? To the Children?

Raleigh. To whom speak you this? You tell me News I never heard of.

Attourney. Oh Sir, do I? I will prove you the Notoriousest Traytor that ever came to the Bar. After you have taken away the King, you would alter Religion: as you, Sir Walter Raleigh, have followed them of the Bye in Imitation; for I will charge you with the words.

Raleigh. Your words cannot condemn me, my Innocency is my Defence: Prove one of these things wherewith you have charg'd me, and I will confess the whole Indictment, and that I am the horriblest Traytor that ever lived, and worthy to be Crucifi'd with a thousand thousand Torments.

Attourney. Nay, I will prove all: Thou art a Monster, thou hast an English Face, but a Spanish Heart. Now you must have Money: Aremberg was no sooner in England (I Charge thee Raleigh) but thou incitedst Cobham to go unto him, and to deal with him for Money, to bestow on discontented Persons, to raise Rebellion on the Kingdom.

Raleigh. Let me Answer for my self.

Attourney. Thou shalt not.

Raleigh. It concerneth my Life.

Lord Chief Justice Popham. Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attourney is but yet in the Gene-general, but when the Kings Counsel have given the Evidence wholly, you shall answer every Particular.

Attourney. Oh! do I touch you.

Lord Cecil. M. Attourney, when you have done with this general Charge, do you not mean to let him answer to every Particular?

Attourney. Yes, when we deliver the Proofs to be read. Raleigh procured Cobham to go to Aremberg, which he did by his Instigation: Raleigh supped with Cobham before he went to Aremberg; after Supper, Raleigh conducted him to Durham House; from whence Cobham went with Lawrency, a Servant of Aremberg's, unto him, and went in by a Back-way. Cobham could never be quiet until he had entertain'd this Motion, for he had four Letters from Raleigh. Aremberg answered, the Money should be performed, but knew not to whom it should be distributed. Then Cobham and Lawrency came back to Durham House, where they found Raleigh. Cobham and Raleigh went up, and left Lawrency below, where they had secret Conference in a Gallery, and after Cobham and Lawrency departed from Raleigh. Your Jargon was Peace! What is that? Spanish Invasion, Scotish Subversion. And again, you are not a fit Man to take so much Money for procuring of a Lawful Peace, for Peace procur'd by Money is dishonourable. Then Cobham must go to Spain, and return by Jersey, where you were Captain: And then because Cobham had not so much Policy, or at least Wickedness as you, he must have your advice for the distribution of the Money. Would you have deposed so good a King, lineally descended of Elizabeth, Eldest Daughter of Edward the 4*th*? Why then must you set up another? I think you meant to make Arabella a Titular Queen, of whose Title I will speak nothing, but sure you meant to make her a Stale: Ah good Lady! you could mean her no good.

Raleigh. You tell me News, Mr. Attourney.

Attourney. Oh Sir! I am the more large, because I know with whom I deal: For we have to deal to day with a Man of Wit.

Raleigh. Did I ever speak with this Lady?

Attourney. I will track you out before I have done: English-Men will not be led by perswasion of Words, but they must have Books to perswade.

Raleigh. The Book was written by a Man of your Profession, Mr. Attourney.

Attourney. I would not have you impatient.

Raleigh. Methinks you fall out with your self, I say nothing.

Attourney. By this Book you would perswade Men that he is not the Lawful King. Now let us consider some Circumstances: My Lords, you know my Lord Cobham (for whom we all Lament, and Rejoyce; Lament in that his House, which hath stood so long unspotted, is now Ruinated; Rejoyce, in that his Treasons are Reveal'd): he is neither Politician nor Sword-man; Raleigh was both, united in the Cause with him, and therfore cause of his Destruction. Another Circumstance is the secret Contriving of it. Humphry Stafford claimed Sanctuary for Treason. Raleigh in his Machivilian Policy hath made a Sanctuary for Treason. He must talk with none but Cobham, because (saith he) one Witness can never condemn me. For Brook said unto Sir Griffith Markham, Take heed how you do make my Lord Cobham acquainted; for whatsoever he knoweth, Raleigh the Witch will get out of him. As soon as Raleigh was examined on one Point of Treason concerning my Lord Cobham, he wrote to him thus; I have been examined of you, and confessed nothing. Further you sent to him by your trusty Francis Kemish, that one Witness could not condemn; and therefore bad his Lordship be of good Courage. Came this out of Cobham's Quiver? No: But out of Raleigh's Machivilian and Deviliſh Policy. Yea, but Cobham did retract it; Why then did you urge it? Now then see the most horrible Practices that ever came out of the bottomless Pit of the Lowest Hell. After that Raleigh had Intelligence that Cobham had Accused him, he endeavoured to have Intelligence from Cobham, which he had gotten by young Sir John Payton: But I think it was the Error of his Youth.

Raleigh. The Lords told it me, or else I had not been sent to the Tower.

Attourney. Thus Cobham by the Instigation of Raleigh, entred into these Actions: So that the Question will be, Whether you are not the principal Traitor, and he would nevertheless have entred into it? Why did Cobham retract all that same? First, because Raleigh was so Odious, he thought he should fare the worse for his sake. Secondly, he thought thus with himself, If he be free, I shall clear my self the better. After this Cobham asked for a Preacher to confer with, pretending to have Doctor Andrews; but indeed he meant not to have him, but Mr. Galloway; a Worthy and Reverend Preacher, who can do more with the King (as he said) than any other; that he, seeing his constant Denial, might inform the King thereof. Here he plays with the Preacher. If Raleigh could perswade the Lords, that Cobham had no Intent to travel, then he thought all should be well. Here is Forgery. In the Tower Cobham must write to Sir Thomas Vane, a Worthy Man, that he meant not to go into Spain; which Letter Raleigh devised in Cobham's Name.

Raleigh.

Raleigh. I will wash my hands of the Indictment, and die a true Man to the King.

Attourney. You are the absoluteſt Traytor that ever was.

Raleigh. Your Phraſes will not prove it, Mr. Attourney.

Attourney. Cobham writeth a Letter to my Lord Cecil, and doth will Mellis his Man, to lay it in a Spaniſh Bible, and to make as though he found it by chance. This was after he had Intelligence with this Viper, that he was falſe.

Lord Cecil. You mean a Letter intended to me, I never had it.

Attourney. No, my Lord, you had it not. You, my Maſters of the Jury, reſpect not the Wickedneſs and Hatred of the Man, reſpect his Cauſe; if he be guilty, I know you will have care of it, for the Preſervation of the King, the Continuance of the Goſpel authoriſed, and the Good of us all.

Raleigh. I do not hear yet, that you have ſpoken one word againſt me, here is no Treaſon of mine done: If my Lord Cobham be a Traytor, what is that to me?

Attourney. All that he did was by thy Inſtigation, thou Viper; for I thou thee, thou Traytor.

Raleigh. It becometh not a Man of Quality and Vertue, to call me ſo: But I take comfort in it, it is all you can do.

Attourney. Have I anger'd you?

Raleigh. I am in no Caſe to be angry.

Popham. Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attourney ſpeaketh out of the Zeal of his duty, for the Service of the King, and you for your Life; be valiant on both ſides.

Now they proceed to the Reading the Proofs.

The Lord Cobham's Examination read.

'He confeſſeth he had a Paſſport to go 'into Spain, intending to go to the Arch-'Duke to confer with him about theſe Pra-'ctices; and becauſe he knew the Arch-'Duke had not Money to pay his own Ar-'my, from thence he meant to go to Spain, 'to deal with the King for the 600000 'Crowns, and to return by Jerſey, and that 'nothing ſhould be done, until he had ſpo-'ken with Sir Walter Raleigh for diſtributi-'on of the Money, to them which were diſ-'contented in England. At the firſt begin-'ning he breathed out Oaths and Exclama-'tions againſt Raleigh, calling him Villain 'and Traytor; ſaying he had never entred 'into theſe Courſes, but by his Inſtigation, 'and that he would never let him alone.

Here Mr. Attourney willed the Clerk of the Crown Office to read over theſe laſt words again (he would never let him alone.)

The Lord Cobham's Examination.

'Beſides he ſpake of Plots and Invaſions: 'Of the Particulars whereof he could give 'no Account, though Raleigh and he had 'conferred of them. Further, he ſaid, He 'was afraid of Raleigh, that when he ſhould 'return by Jerſey, that he would have him 'and the Money to the King. Being Exa-'mined of Sir Arthur Gorge, he freed him, 'ſaying:

They never durſt truſt him, but Sir Arthur Savage they intended to uſe, becauſe they thought him a fit Man.

Raleigh. Let me ſee the Accuſation: This is abſolutely all the Evidence can be brought againſt me; poor ſhifts! You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray you underſtand this: This is that which muſt either condemn, or give me Life; which muſt free me, or ſend my Wife and Children to beg their Bread about the Streets. This is that muſt prove me a nororious Traytor, or a true Subject to the King. Let me ſee my Accuſation, that I may make my Anſwer.

Clerk of the Council. I did read it, and ſhew you all the Examinations.

Raleigh. At my firſt Examination at Windſor, my Lords asked me, what I knew of Cobham's Practice with Aremberg? I anſwered Negatively: And as concerning Arabella, I proteſt before God, I never heard one word of it. If that be proved, let me be guilty of ten thouſand Treaſons. It is a ſtrange thing you will impute that to me, when I never heard ſo much as the Name of Arabella Stuart, but only the Name of Arabella.

After being Examined, I told my Lords, that I thought my Lord Cobham had Conference with Aremberg, I ſuſpected his Viſiting of him; For after he departed from me at Durham Houſe, I ſaw him paſs by his own Stairs, and paſſed over to S. Mary Saviours, where I knew Lawrency, a Merchant, and a Follower of Aremberg, lay, and therefore likely to go unto him. My Lord Cecil asked my Opinion concerning Lawrency; I ſaid, that if you do not apprehend Lawrency, it is dangerous he will flie; if you do apprehend him, you ſhall give my Lord Cobham notice thereof. I was asked likewiſe, who was the greateſt Man with my Lord Cobham? I anſwered, I knew no Man ſo great with him, as young Wyat of Kent.

Aſſoon as Cobham ſaw my Letter to have diſcovered his Dealing with Aremberg, in his Fury he accuſed me, but before he came to the Stair-foot he repented, and ſaid he had done me Wrong. When he came to the end of his Accuſation, he added, That if he had brought this Money to Jersey, he fear'd that I would have deliver'd him and the money to the King. Mr. Attourny, you said this never came out of Cobham's Quiver, he is a simple Man. Is he so simple? No: He hath a Disposition of his own, he will not easily be guided by others, but when he has once taken Head in a Matter, he is not easily drawn from it; he is no Babe. But it is strange for me to devise with Cobham, that he should go to Spain, to perswade the King to disburse so much Money, he being a Man of no Love in England, and I having resigned my room of chiefest Command, the Wardenship of the Stanneries: Is it not strange for me to make my self Robin Hood, or a Kett, or a Cade? I knowing England to be in better Estate to defend it self than ever it was. I knew Scotland United; Ireland Quieted, wherein of late our Forces were dispersed; Denmark assured, which before was suspected. I knew that having a Lady whom Time had surprized, we had now an active King, a lawful Successor, who would himself be present in all his Affairs. The State of Spain was not unknown to me. I had written a Discourse, which I had intended to present unto the King, against Peace with Spain. I knew the Spaniard had six Repulses, three in Ireland, and three at Sea, and once in 1588 at Cales, by my Lord Admiral. I knew he was Discouraged and Dishonoured. I knew the King of Spain to be the proudest Prince in Christendom; but now he cometh Creeping to the King my Master for Peace. I knew whereas before he had in his Port six or seven score Sail of Ships, he hath now but Six or Seven. I knew of Twenty five Millions he had from his Indies, he hath scarce one left. I knew him to be so Poor, that the Jesuites in Spain, who were wont to have such large Allowance, were fain to beg at the Church-Door. Was it ever read or heard, that any Prince should disburse so much Money without a sufficient Pawn? I knew her own Subjects, the Citizens of London, would not lend her Majesty Money without Lands in Mortgage. I knew the Queen did not lend the States Money without Flushing, Brill, and other Towns for a Pawn. And can it be thought, that he would let Cobham have so great a Sum?

I never came to the Lord Cobham's but about matters of his Profit, as the Ordering of his House, Paying of his Servants Board-wages, &c. I had of his when I was examined, Four Thousand Pounds worth of Jewels for a Purchase; a Pearl of three thousand Pound, and a Ring worth five hundred Pound: If he had had a fancy to run away, he would not have left so much to have purchased a Lease in Fee Farm. I saw him buy three hundred Pounds worth of Books to send to his Library at Canterbury, and a Cabinet of thirty Pound to give to Mr. Attourney, for drawing the Conveyances; and God in Heaven knoweth, not I, whether he intended to travel or no. But for that Practice with Arabella, or Letters to Aremberg framed, or any Discourse with him, or in what Language he spake unto him; if I knew any of these things, I would absolutely confess the Indictment, and acknowledge my self worthy ten thousand Deaths.

Cobham's second Examination Read.

The Lord Cobham being required to subscribe to an Examination, there was shewed a Note under Sir Walter Raleigh's hand, the which when he had perused, he paused and after brake forth into these Speeches; Oh Villain! Oh Traytor! I will now tell you all the Truth: And then said, His purpose was to go into Flanders, and into Spain, for the obtaining the aforesaid Money, and that Raleigh had appointed to meet him in Jersey as he returned Home, to be advised of him about the Distribution of the Money.

Popham, Lord Chief Justice. When Cobham answer'd to the Interrogatories, he made scruple to subscribe, and being urged to it, he said, If he might hear me affirm, that a Person of his Degree ought to set his Hand, he would; I lying then at Richmond, for fear of the Plague, was sent for, and I told he ought to subscribe; otherwise it were a Contempt of a high Nature: Then he subscribed. The Lords questioned with him further, and he shewed them a Letter, as I thought written to me, but it was indeed written to my Lord Cecil: He desired to see the Letter again, and then said, Oh Wretch! Oh Traytor! Whereby I perceived you had not performed that Trust he had reposed in you.

Raleigh. He is as passionate a Man as lives, for he hath not spared the best Friends he hath in England in his Passion. My Lords, I take it, he that has been examined, has ever been asked at the time of his Examination, if it be according to his meaning, and then to subscribe. Methinks, my Lords, when he accuses a Man, he should give some Account and Reason of it; it is not sufficient to say, we talked of it. If I had been the Plotter, would not I have given Cobham some Arguments, whereby to perswade the King of Spain, and answer his Objections. I knew Westmorland, and Bothwell, Men of other Understandings than Cobham, were ready to beg their Bread.

Sir Thomas Fowler, one of the Jury. Did Sir Walter Raleigh write a Letter to my Lord before he was examined concerning him, or not?

Attourney. Yes.

Lord Cecil. I am in great Dispute with my self to speak in the Case of this Gentleman: A former Dearneſs between me and him tied ſo firm a Knot of my Conceit of his Virtues, now broken by a Diſcovery of his Imperfections. I proteſt, did I ſerve a King that I knew would be diſpleaſed with me for ſpeaking, in this Caſe I would ſpeak whatever came of it: But ſeeing he is compacted of Piety and Juſtice, and one that will not miſlike of any Man for ſpeaking a Truth, I will anſwer your Queſtion.

Sir Walter Raleigh was ſtaid by me at Windſor, upon the firſt News of Coply, that the Kings Perſon ſhould be ſurpriſed by my Lord Grey, and Mr. George Brook; when I found Brook was in, I ſuſpected Cobham, then I doubted Raleigh to be a partaker. I ſpeak not this, that it ſhould be thought I had greater Judgment than the reſt of my Lords, in making this haſte to have them examined. Raleigh following to Windſor, I met with him, upon the Tarras, and willed him as from the King to ſtay, ſaying the Lords had ſomething to ſay to him: Then he was examined, but not concerning my Lord Cobham, but of the Surpriſing Treaſon. My Lord Grey was apprehended, and likewiſe Brook; by Brook we found, that he had given notice to Cobham of the ſurpriſing Treaſon, as he delivered it to us, but with as much ſparingneſs of a Brother as he might: We ſent for my Lord Cobham to Richmond, where he ſtood upon his Juſtification and his Quality; ſometimes being froward, he ſaid he was not bound to ſubſcribe, wherewith we made the King acquainted. Cobham ſaid, if my Lord Chief Juſtice would ſay it were a Contempt, he would ſubſcribe; whereof being reſolved, he ſubſcribed. There was a Light given to Aremberg, that Lawrency was examined, but that Raleigh knew that Cobham was examined, is more than I know.

Raleigh. If my Lord Cobham had truſted me in the Main, was not I as fit a Man to be truſted in the Bye?

Lord Cecil. Raleigh did by his Letters acquaint us, that my Lord Cobham had ſent Lawrency to Aremberg, when he knew not he had any Dealings with him.

Lord H. How. It made for you, if Lawrency had been only acquainted with Cobham, and not with you. But you knew his whole Eſtate, and were acquainted with Cobham's Practice with Lawrency, and it was known to you before, that Lawrency depended on Aremberg.

Attourney. 1. Raleigh proteſted againſt the ſurpriſing Treaſon. 2. That he knew not of the Matter touching Arabella. I would not charge you, Sir Walter, with a matter of Falſhood: You ſay, you ſuſpected the Intelligence that Cobham had with Aremberg, by Lawrency.

Raleigh. I thought it had been no other Intelligence, but ſuch as might be warranted.

Attourney. Then it was but lawful Suſpicion. But to that whereas you ſaid, that Cobham had accuſed you in Paſſion, I anſwer three Ways: 1. I obſerved when Cobham ſaid, Let me ſee the Letter again? he pauſed, and when he did ſee that Count Aremberg was touched, he cried out, Oh Traytor! Oh Villain! Now will I confeſs the whole Truth. 2. The Accuſation of a Man on Hear-ſay, is nothing: Would he accuſe himſelf on Paſſion, and ruinate his Cauſe and Poſterity, out of Malice to accuſe you? 3. Could this be out of Paſſion? Mark the manner of it: Cobham had told this at leaſt two months before to his Brother Brook, You are Fools, you are on the Bye. Raleigh and I are on the Main, we mean to take away the King and his Cubs; this he delivered two months before. So mark the manner and the matter, he would not turn the Weapon againſt his own Boſom, and accuſe himſelf to accuſe you.

Raleigh. Hath Cobham confeſſed that?

Lord Chief Juſtice. This is ſpoken by Mr. Attourney, to prove that Cobham's Speech came not out of Paſſion.

Raleigh. Let it be proved that Cobham ſaid ſo.

Attourney. Cobham ſaith, He was a long time doubtful of Raleigh, that he would ſend him and the money to the King. Did Cobham fear leſt you would betray him in Jerſey? Then of neceſſity there muſt be Truſt between you. No man can betray a man but he that is truſted, in my underſtanding. This is the greateſt Argument to prove that he was acquainted with Cobham's Proceedings. Raleigh has a deeper reach than to make himſelf, as he ſaid, Robin Hood, a Kett or Cade, yet I never heard that Robin Hood was a Traytor; they ſay he was an Outlaw. And whereas he ſaith, that our King is not only more Wealthy and Potent than his Predeceſſors, but alſo more Politick and Wiſe, ſo that he could have no hope to prevail. I anſwer, There is no King ſo Potent, Wiſe and Active, but he may be overtaken through Treaſon. Whereas you ſay Spain is ſo Poor, diſcourſing ſo largely thereof: it had been better for you to have kept in Guiana, than to have been ſo well acquainted with the State of Spain. Beſides, if you could have brought Spain and Scotland to have joyned, you might have hoped to prevail a great deal the better. For his ſix Overthrows, I anſwer; He hath the more Malice, becauſe Repulſes breed deſire of Revenge. Then you ſay, you never talked with Cobham but about Leaſes, and letting Lands, and ordering his Houſe; I never knew you Clerk of the Kitchin, &c. If you had fallen on your your Knees at firſt, and confeſſed the Treaſon, it had been better for you. You ſay, he meant to have given me a Cabinet of thirty Pounds, perhaps, he thought by thoſe means to have anticipated me therewith. But you ſay, all theſe are Circumſtances. I anſwer, all this Accuſation in Circumſtance is true: Here now I might appeal to my Lords, that you take hold of this, that he ſubſcribed not to the Accuſation.

Lord H. How. Cobham was not then preſſed to ſubſcribe.

Attourney. His Accuſation being teſtified by the Lords, is of as great force, as if he had ſubſcribed. Raleigh ſaith again, if the Accuſer be alive, he muſt be brought face to face to ſpeak, and alledges 25*th Edw.* 3*d.* That there muſt be two ſufficient Witneſſes that muſt be brought face to fece before the Accuſed, and alledgeth 10, and 13 Eliz.

Raleigh. You try me by the Spaniſh Inquiſition, if You proceed only by the Circumſtances without two Witneſſes.

Attourney. This is a Treaſonable Speech.

Raleigh. Evertere hominem juſtum in Cauſa ſua injuſtum eſt: Good my Lords, let it be proved either by the Laws of the Land, or the Laws of God, that there ought not to be two Witneſſes appointed; yet I will not ſtand to defend this Point in Law, if the King will have it ſo: it is no rare thing for a Man to be falſly accuſed. A Judg condemned a Woman in Sarum for killing her Husband, on the Teſtimony of one Witneſs; afterwards his Man confeſſed the Murther, when ſhe was executed. Who after being touched in Conſcience for the Judgment, was uſed to ſay, Quod nunquam de hoc facto animam in vita ſua purgaret. It is alſo commanded by the Scripture, Allocutus eſt Jehova Moſen, In Ore duorum aut trium Teſtium, &c.

If Chriſt requireth it, as it appeareth, Matth. 18. If by the Canon, Civil Law, and God's Word, it be required, that there muſt be two Witneſſes at the leaſt, bear with me if I deſire one.

I would not deſire to live, if I were privy to Cobham's Proceedings: I had been a Slave, a Villain, a Fool, if I had endeavoured to ſet up Arabella, and refuſed ſo Gracious a Lord and Sovereign: But urge your Proofs.

Lord Chief Juſtice. You have offered Queſtions on divers Statuters, all which mention two Accuſers in caſe of Indictments; you have deceived your ſelf, for the Laws of 25 Ed. 3. and 5 Ed. 6. are repeal'd. It ſufficeth now if there be Proofs made either under Hand, or by Teſtimony of Witneſſes, or by Oaths; it needs not the Subſcription of the Party, ſo there be Hands of credible Men to teſtifie the Examination.

Raleigh. It may be an Error in me, and if thoſe Laws be repeal'd, yet I hope the Equity of them remains ſtill; but if you affirm it, it muſt be a Law to Poſterity. The Proof of the Common Law is by Witneſs and Jury, let Cobham be here, let him ſpeak it: Call my Accuſer before my Face, and I have done.

Attourney. Scientia ſceleris eſt mera Ignorantia: You have read the Letter of the Law, but underſtand it not. Here was your Anchor-hold, and your Randeſvous: you truſt to Cobham, either Cobham muſt accuſe you, or no body; if he did, then it would not hurt you, becauſe he is but one Witneſs; if he did not, then you are ſafe.

Raleigh. If ever I read word of the Law or Statute before I was Priſoner in the Tower, God confound me.

Attourney. Now I come to prove the Circumſtances of the Accuſation to be true. Cobham confeſſed he had a paſſport to travel, hereby intending to preſent Overtures to the Arch-Duke, and from thence to go to Spain, and there to have Conference with the King for Money: You ſay he promiſed to come home by Jerſey, to make merry with you and your Wife.

Raleigh. I ſaid, in his return from France, not Spain.

Attourney. Further, in his Examination he ſaith, nothing could be ſet down for the Diſtribution of the Money to the Diſcontented, without Conference with Raleigh. You ſaid it ſhould have been for procurement of Peace, but it was for raiſing Rebellion. Further, Cobham ſaith, he would never have entred into theſe Courſes, but by your Inſtigation, and that you would never let him alone. Your Scholar was not apt enough to tell us all the Plots, that is enough for you to do, that are his Maſter: You intended to truſt Sir Arthur Savage, whom I take to be an honeſt and true Gentleman, but not Sir Arthur Gorge.

Raleigh. All this is but one Accuſation of Cobham's, I hear no other thing; to which Accuſation he never ſubſcribed nor avouched it; I beſeech you, my Lords, let Cobham be ſent for, charge him on his Soul, on his Allegiance to the King; if he affirm it, I am Guilty.

Lord Cecil. It is the Accuſation of my Lord Cobham, it is the Evidence againſt you, muſt it not be of force without his Subſcription? I deſire to be reſolved by the Judges, whether by the Law it is not a forcible Argument of Evidence.

The Judges. My Lord, it is.

Raleigh. The King at his Coronation is ſworn, In omnibus Judiciis ſuis Æquitatem, non Rigorem Regis, obſervare: by the Rigour and Cruelty of the Law it may be a forcible Evidence.

Lord Chief Juſtice. That is not the Rigour of the Law, but the Juſtice of the Law;

Law; else when a Man hath made a plain Accusation, by Practice he might be brought to retract it again.

Raleigh. Oh my Lord, you may use Equity.

Lord Chief Justice. That is from the King, you are to have Justice from us.

Lord Anderson. The Law is, if the Matter be proved to the Jury, they must find you Guilty; for Cobham's Accusation is not only against you, there are other things sufficient.

Lord Cecil. Now that Sir Walter Raleigh is satisfied, that Cobham's Subscription is not necessary: I pray you Mr. Attourney go on.

Raleigh. Good Mr. Attourney be patient, and give me leave.

Lord Cecil. An unnecessary Patience is a hindrance, let him go on with his Proofs, and then refel them.

Raleigh. I would answer particularly.

Lord Cecil. If you would have a Table, and Pen, and Ink, you shall.

Then Paper and Ink was given him.

Here the Clerk of the Crown read the Letter, which the Lord Cobham did write in July, which was to the effect of his former Examination, further saying, I have disclosed all; to accuse any one falsely, were to burden my own Conscience.

Attourney. Read Coplie's Confession the 8th of June, he saith, He was offered 1000 Crowns to be in this Action.

Here Watson's Additions were read.

"The great Mass of Money from the "Count was impossible, saith Brook, &c.

Brook's Confession read.

"There have Letters passed, saith he, be-"tween Cobham and Aremberg, for a great Sum of Money, to assist a second Action for the surprising of his Majesty.

Attourney. It is not possible it was of Passion; for it was in talk before three Men being severally examined, who agreed in the Sum to be bestowed on discontented Persons. That Grey should have 12000 Crowns, and Raleigh should have 8000, or 10000 Crowns.

Cobham's Examination, July 18.

"If the Money might be procured (saith "he) then a Man may give Pensions. Be-"ing asked if a Pension should not be given "to his Brother Brook, he denied it not.

Lawrency's Examination.

"Within five days after Aremberg arri-"ved; Cobham resorted unto him. That "Night that Cobham went to Aremberg "with Lawrency, Raleigh supped with him.

Attourney. Raleigh must have his part of the Money, therefore now he is a Traytor. The Crown shall never stand one Year on the Head of the King (my Master) if a Traytor may not be condemned by Circumstances: For if A. tells B. and B. tells C. and C. D. &c. you shall never prove Treason by two Witnesses.

Raleigh's Examination was read

He confesseth Cobham offered him 8000 Crowns, which he was to have for the furtherance of the Peace between England and Spain; and that he should have it within three days. To which, he said, he gave this Answer, When I see the Money I will tell you more; for I had thought it had been one of his ordinary idle Conceits, and therefore made no account thereof.

Raleigh. The Attourney hath made a long Narration of Copley, and the Priests, which concerns me nothing, neither know I how Cobham was alter'd. For he told me, if I would agree to further the Peace, he would get me 8000 Crowns. I asked him, Who shall have the rest of the Money? He said, I will offer such a Noble Man (who was not named) some of the Money. I said, he will not be perswaded by you, and he will extreamly hate you for such a Motion. Let me be pinched to Death with hot Irons, if ever I knew there was any Intention to bestow the Money on discontented Persons. I had made a Discourse against the Peace, and would have Printed it: If Cobham changed his mind; if the Priests, if Brook had any such intent, what is that to me? They must answer for it. He offered me the Money before Aremberg came, that is difference of time.

Serjeant Philips. Raleigh confesseth the Matter, but avoideth it by distinguishing of Times. You said it was offer'd you before the coming of Aremberg; which is false. For you being examined whether you should have such money of Cobham, or not: You said yea, and that you should have it within two or three days. Nemo meriturus præsumitur mentiri.

Lord Hen. How. Alledg me any Ground or Cause, wherefore you gave ear to my Lord Cobham for receiving Pensions, in Matters you had not to deal with.

Raleigh. Could I stop my Lord Cobham's Mouth?

Lord Cecil. Sir Walter Raleigh presseth, that my Lord Cobham should be brought face to face. If he ask things of Favour and Grace, they must come only from him that can give them. If we sit here as Commissioners, how shall we be satisfied whether he ought to be brought, unless we hear the Judges speak.

Lord Chief Justice. This thing cannot be granted, for then a number of Treasons should flourish: The Accuser may be drawn by Practice, whilst he is in Person.

Judge

Judg Gawdy. The Statute you ſpeak of, concerning two Witneſſes in caſe of Treaſon is found to be inconvenient, therefore by another Law it was taken away.

Raleigh. The common Trial of England is by Jury and Witneſſes.

Lord Chief Juſtice. No, by Examination: If three conſpire a Treaſon, and they all confeſs it; here is never a Witneſs, yet they are condemned.

Judg Warburton. I marvel, Sir Walter, that you being of ſuch Experience and Wit, ſhould ſtand on this Point; for ſo many Horſe-ſtealers may eſcape, if they may not be condemned without Witneſſes. If one ſhould ruſh into the King's Privy-Chamber, whilſt he is alone, and kill the King (which God forbid) and this man be met coming with his Sword drawn all Bloody; ſhall not he be condemned to Death? My Lord Cobham hath, perhaps, been laboured withal; and to ſave you, his old Friend, it may be that he will deny all that which he hath ſaid.

Raleigh. I know not how you conceive the Law.

Lord Chief Juſtice. Nay, we do not conceive the Law, but we know the Law.

Raleigh. The Wiſdom of the Law of God is abſolute and perfect, Hæc fac, & vives, &c. But now by the Wiſdom of the State, the Wiſdom of the Law is uncertain. Indeed where the Accuſer is not to be had conveniently, I agree with you; but here my Accuſer may, he is alive, and in the Houſe. Suſanna had been condemned, if Daniel had not cried out: Will you condemn an innocent Iſraelite, without Examination or Knowledge of the Truth? Remember, it is abſolutely the Commandment of God: If a falſe Witneſs riſe up, you ſhall cauſe him to be brought before the Judges; if he be found falſe, he ſhall have the Puniſhment which the Accuſed ſhould have had. It is very ſure for my Lord to accuſe me is my certain Danger, and it may be a means to excuſe himſelf.

Lord Chief Juſtice. There muſt not ſuch a Gap be opened for the Deſtruction of the King, as would be if we ſhould grant this. You plead hard for your ſelf, but the Laws plead as hard for the thing. I did never hear that Courſe to be taken in a Caſe of Treaſon, as to write one to another, or ſpeak one to another during the time of their Impriſonment. There hath been Intelligence between you, and what underhand Practices there may be, I know not. If the Circumſtances agree not with the Evidence, we will not condemn you.

Raleigh. The King deſires nothing but the knowledge of the Truth, and would have no advantage taken by Severity of the Law. If ever we had a Gracious King, now we have; I hope, as he is, ſuch are his Miniſters. If there be but a Trial of five Marks at common Law, a Witneſs muſt be depoſed. Good my Lords, let my Accuſer come face to face, and be depoſed.

Lord Chief Juſtice. You have no Law for it: God forbid any man ſhould accuſe himſelf upon his Oath.

Attourney. The Law preſumes, a man will not accuſe himſelf to accuſe another. You are an odious man: For Cobham thinks his Cauſe the worſe that you are in it. Now you ſhall hear of ſome Stirs to be raiſed in Scotland.

Part of Coplie's Examination.

"Alſo Watſon told me, that a ſpecial "Perſon told him, that Aremberg offer'd to "him a thouſand Crowns to be in that "Action; and that Brook ſaid, the Stirs in "Scotland came out of Raleigh's Head.

Raleigh. Brook hath been taught his Leſſon.

Lord H. How. This Examination was taken before me; Did I teach him his Leſſon?

Raleigh. I proteſt before God, I meant it not by any Privy Counſellor; but becauſe Money is ſcant, he will juggle on both ſides.

Raleigh's Examination.

"The way to invade England, were to "begin with Stirs in Scotland.

Raleigh. I think ſo ſtill: I have ſpoken it to divers of the Lords of the Council, by way of Diſcourſe and Opinion.

Attourney. Now let us come to thoſe words of Deſtroying the King and his Cubs.

Raleigh. O barbarous! if they, like unnatural Villains, ſhould uſe thoſe words, ſhall I be charged with them? I will not hear it, I was never any Plotter with them againſt my Country, I was never falſe to the Crown of England. I have ſpent 4000 Pounds of my own againſt the Spaniſh Faction, for the Good of my Country. Do you bring the words of theſe Helliſh Spiders, Clark, Watſon, and others againſt me?

Attourney. Thou haſt a Spaniſh Heart, and thy ſelf art a Spider of Hell; for thou confeſſeſt the King to be a moſt Sweet and Gracious Prince, and yet haſt conſpired againſt him.

Watſon's Examination read.

"He ſaid, that George Brook told him "twice, That his Brother, the Lord Cobham, "ſaid to him, That you are but on the Bye, "but Raleigh and I are on the Main.

Brook's

Brook's Examination read.

"Being askt what was meant by this Jargon the Bye and the Main? he ſaid, That "the Lord Cobham told him, That Grey and "others were in the Bye, he and Raleigh "were on the Main. Being askt what Expoſition his Brother made of theſe words? "he ſaid, he is loth to repeat it. And after ſaith, by the Main was meant the taking away of the King and his Iſſue; and thinks on his Conſcience, it was infuſed "into his Brother's Head by Raleigh.

Cobham's Examination read.

"Being askt, if ever he had ſaid, It will "never be well in England, till the King "and his Cubs were taken away. He ſaid, he "had anſwered before, and that he would "anſwer no more to that Point.

Raleigh. I am not named in all this: There is a Law of two ſorts of Accuſers, one of his own Knowledge, another by Hear-ſay.

Earl of Suffolk. See the Caſe of Arnold.

Lord Chief Juſtice. It is the Caſe of Sir Will. Thomas, and Sir Nicholas Arnold.

Raleigh. If this may be, you will have any Mans Life in a Week.

Attourney. Raleigh ſaith, That Cobham was in a Paſſion when he ſaid ſo. Would he tell his Brother any thing of Malice againſt Raleigh, whom he lov'd as his Life?

Raleigh. Brook never loved me; until his Brother had accuſed me, he ſaid nothing.

Lord Cecil. We have heard nothing that might lead us to think that Brook accuſed you, he was only in the Surpriſing Treaſon; for by accuſing you he ſhould accuſe his Brother.

Raleigh. He doth not care much for that.

Lord Cecil. I muſt judge the beſt. The Accuſation of his Brother was not voluntary; he pared every thing as much as he could, to ſave his Brother.

Cobham's Examination read.

"He ſaith he had a Book written againſt "the Title of the King, which he had of "Raleigh, and that he gave it to his Brother "Brook: and Raleigh ſaid it was fooliſhly written.

Attourney. After the King came within twelve miles of London, Cobham never came to ſee him; and intended to travel without ſeeing the Queen and the Prince. Now in this Diſcontentment you gave him the Book, and he gave it his Brother.

Raleigh. I never gave it him, he took it off my Table. For I well remember a little before that time I received a Challenge from Sir Amias Preſton, and for that I did intend to anſwer it, I reſolved to leave my Eſtate ſetled, therefore laid out all my looſe Papers, amongſt which was this Book.

Lord Howard. Where had you this Book?

Raleigh. In the old Lord Treaſurer's Study, after his Death.

Lord Cecil. Did you ever ſhew or make known the Book to me?

Raleigh. No, my Lord.

Lord Cecil. My Father being employed in the Affairs of State at that time, it was like enough, he had many Books and Papers written againſt the then Queen and State, which might come to his hands by the Diſcovery of ſuch Offences.

Attourney. I obſerve there was Intelligence between you and Cobham in the Tower; for after he ſaid, it was againſt the King's Title, he denied it again.

Sir William Wade. Firſt my Lord Cobham confeſſeth it, and after he had ſubſcribed it, he revoked it again: To me he always ſaid, that the Drift of it was againſt the King's Title.

Raleigh. I proteſt before God, and all his Works, I gave him not the Book.

Nota. Sir Robert Wroth ſpeaketh, or whiſpereth ſomething ſecretly.

Attourney. My Lords, I muſt complain of Sir Robert Wroth, he ſays this Evidence is not material.

Sir Robert Wroth. I never ſpake the words.

Atturney. Let Mr. Serjeant Philips teſtifie, whether he heard him ſay the Words or no.

Lord Cecil. I will give my Word for Sir Robert Wroth.

Sir Robert Wroth. I will ſpeak as truely as you, Mr. Attourney, for by God, I never ſpake it.

Lord Chief Juſtice. Wherefore ſhould this Book be burnt?

Raleigh. I burned it not.

Sergeant Philips. You preſented your Friend with it, when he was diſcontented. If it had been before the Queens Death it had been a leſs matter; but you gave it him preſently when he came from the King, which was the time of his Diſcontentment.

Raleigh. Here is a Book ſuppoſed to be Treaſonable; I never read it, commended it, or delivered it, nor urged it.

Attourney. Why this is cunning.

Raleigh. Every thing that doth make for me is cunning, and every thing that maketh againſt me is probable.

Attourney. Lord Cobham ſaith, that Kemiſh came to him with a Letter torn, and did wiſh him not to be diſmaid, for one Witneſs could not hurt him.

Raleigh. This poor Man hath been cloſe Priſoner theſe eighteen Weeks; he was offered the Rack to make him confeſs. I never ſent any ſuch Meſſage by him, I only writ writ to him, to tell him what I had done with Mr. Attourney; having of his at that time a great Pearl and a Diamond.

Lord H. Howard. No Circumſtance moveth me more than this. Kemiſh was never on the Rack, the King gave charge that no Rigour ſhould be uſed.

Commiſſioners. We proteſt before God, there was no ſuch matter intended to our knowledges.

Raleigh. Was not the Keeper of the Rack ſent for, and he threatned with it?

Sir William Wade. When Mr. Sollicitor and my ſelf examined Kemiſh, we told him he deſerved the Rack, but did not threaten him with it.

Commiſſioners. It was more than we knew.

Cobham's Examination read.

'He ſaith, Kemiſh brought him a Letter 'from Raleigh, and that part which was 'concerning the Lords of the Council, was 'rent out; the Letter contained, that he 'was examined and cleared himſelf of all; 'and that the Lord H. Howard ſaid, be-'cauſe he was diſcontent, he was fit to be in 'the Action. And further, that Kemiſh 'ſaid to him from Raleigh, that he ſhould 'be of good Comfort, for one Witneſs could 'not condemn a Man for Treaſon.

Lord Cecil. Cobham was ask'd, whether, and when he heard from you? he ſaid, Every Day.

Raleigh. Kemiſh added more, I never had him ſpeak thoſe Words.

Nota. Mr. Attourney here offered to interrupt him.

Lord Cecil. It is his laſt Diſcourſe. Give him leave, Mr. Attourney.

Raleigh. I am accuſed concerning Arabella, concerning Money out of Spain. My Lord Chief Juſtice ſaith, a Man may be condemned with one Witneſs, yea, without any Witneſs. Cobham is guilty of many things, Conſcientia mille Teſtes; he hath accuſed himſelf, what can he hope for but mercy? My Lords vouchſafe me this Grace. Let him be brought, being alive, and in the Houſe; let him avouch any of theſe things, I will confeſs the whole Indictment, and renounce the King's Mercy.

Lord Cecil. Here hath been a touch of the Lady Arabella Stuart, a near Kinſwoman of the Kings. Let us not ſcandal the innocent by confuſion of Speech: She is as innocent of all theſe things as I, or any Man here; only ſhe received a Letter from my Lord Cobham, to prepare her; which ſhe laught at, and immediately ſent it to the King. So far was ſhe from Diſcontentment that ſhe laught him to ſcorn. But you ſee how far the Count of Aremberg did conſent.

The Lord Admiral (Nottingham) being by in a Standing, with the Lady Arabella, ſpake to the Court.

The Lady doth here proteſt upon her Salvation, that ſhe never dealt in any of theſe things; and ſo ſhe willed me to tell the Court.

Lord Cecil. The Lord Cobham wrote to my Lady Arabella, to know if he might come to ſpeak with her, and gave her to underſtand, that there were ſome about the King, that laboured to diſgrace her; ſhe doubted it was but a Trick. But Brook ſaith, his Brother moved him to procure Arabella to write Letters to the King of Spain; but he ſaith, he never did it.

Raleigh. The Lord Cobham hath accuſed me, you ſee in what manner he hath forſworn it. Were it not for his Accuſation, all this were nothing. Let him be asked, if I knew of the Letter which Lawrency brought to him from Aremberg. Let me ſpeak for my Life, it can be no hurt for him to be brought; he dares not accuſe me. If you grant me not this Favour, I am ſtrangely uſed. Campion was not denied to have his Accuſers face to face.

Lord Chief Juſtice. Since he muſt needs have Juſtice, the Acquitting of his old Friend may move him to ſpeak otherwiſe than the Truth.

Raleigh. If I had been the Infuſer of all theſe Treaſons into him. You Gentlemen of the Jury, mark this, he ſaid I have been the Cauſe of all his Miſeries, and the Deſtruction of his Houſe, and that all Evil hath happened unto him, by my wicked counſel. If this be true, whom hath he cauſe to accuſe, and to be revenged on, but on me? And I know him to be as revengefull as any man on Earth.

Attourney. He is a Party, and may not come; the Law is againſt it.

Raleigh. It is a Toy to tell me of Law. I defie ſuch Law, I ſtand on the Fact.

Lord Cecil. I am afraid my often ſpeaking (who am inferiour to my Lords here preſent) will make the World think I delight to hear my ſelf talk. My Affection to you, Sir Walter Raleigh, was not extinguiſhed, but ſlacked in regard of your deſerts. You know the Law of the Realm (to which your mind doth not conteſt) that my Lord Cobham cannot be brought.

Raleigh. He may be, my Lord.

Lord Cecil. But dare you challenge it?

Raleigh. No.

L. Cecil. You ſay that my Lord Cobham, your main Accuſer, muſt come to accuſe you. You ſay, he hath retracted: I ſay, many particulars are not retracted. What the Validity of all this is, is meerly left to the Jury. Let me ask you this, If my Lord Cobham will ſay you were the only In-ſtigator of him to proceed in the Treaſons, dare you put your ſelf on this?

Raleigh. If he will ſpeak it before God and the King, that ever I knew of Arabella's Matter, or the Money out of Spain, or of the ſurpriſing Treaſon; I put my ſelf on it. God's Will and the King's be done with me.

Lord H. Howard. How if he ſpeak things equivalent to that you have ſaid.

Raleigh. Yes in the main Point.

Lord Cecil. If he ſay, you have been the Inſtigator of him to deal with the Spaniſh King, had not the Council cauſe to draw you hither?

Raleigh. I put my ſelf on it.

Lord Cecil. Then Sir Walter Raleigh, call upon God, and prepare your ſelf; for I do verily believe my Lords will prove this. Excepting your faults (I call them no worſe) by God I am your Friend. The Heat and Paſſion in you, and the Attorney's Zeal in the King's Service makes me ſpeak this.

Raleigh. Whoſoever is the Workman, it is reaſon he ſhould give account of his Work to the Work-maſter. But let it be proved that he acquainted me with any of his Conferences with Aremberg: he would ſurely have given me ſome account.

L. Cecil. That follows not. If I ſet you on work, and you give me no account, am I therefore innocent?

Attourney. For the Lady Arabella, I ſaid ſhe was never acquainted with the matter. Now that Raleigh had Conference in all theſe Treaſons, it is manifeſt; The Jury hath heard the matter. There is one Dyer, a Pilot, that being in Lisbon, met with a Portugal Gentleman, who ask'd him if the King of England was Crown'd yet? To whom he anſwered, I think not yet, but he ſhall be ſhortly. Nay, ſaith the Portugal, that ſhall never be, for his Throat will be cut by Don Raleigh and Don Cobham before he be Crowned.

Dyer was called and ſworn, and delivered this Evidence.

Dyer. I came to a Merchants Houſe in Lisbon, to ſee a Boy that I had there; there came a Gentleman into the Houſe, and enquiring what Countryman I was? I ſaid, an Engliſhman. Whereupon he asked me, if the King was crowned? And I anſwered, No, but that I hoped he ſhould be ſo ſhortly. Nay, ſaith he, he ſhall never be Crowned; for Don Raleigh and Don Cobham will cut his Throat ere that day come.

Raleigh. What infer you upon this?

Attourney. That your Treaſon hath wings.

Raleigh. If Cobham did practiſe with Aremberg, how could it not but be known in Spain? Why did they name the Duke of Buckingham with Jack Straw's Treaſon, and the Duke of York with Jack Cade, but that it was to countenance his Treaſon.

Conſider you Gentlemen of the Jury, there is no Cauſe ſo doubtful which the Kings Council cannot make good againſt the Law. Conſider my Diſability, and their Ability: They prove nothing againſt me, only they bring the Accuſation of my Lord Cobham, which he hath lamented and repented as heartily, as if it had been for an horrible Murther for he knew that all this Sorrow which ſhould come to me, is by his means. Preſumptions muſt proceed from precedent or ſubſequent Facts. I have ſpent 40000 Crowns againſt the Spaniard. I had not purchaſed 40 Pound a Year. If I had died in Guiana, I had not left 300 Marks a Year to my Wife and Son. I that have always condemned the Spaniſh Faction, methinks it is a ſtrange thing that now I ſhould affect it! Remember what S. Auſtin ſays, Sic judicate tanquam ab alio mox judicandi, unus Judex, unum Tribunal. If you would be contented on Preſumptions to be delivered up to be ſlaughtered, to have your Wives and Children turned into the Streets to beg their Bread; If you would be contented to be ſo judged, judge ſo of me.

Serj. Philips. I hope to make this ſo clear as that the Wit of Man ſhall have no Colour to anſwer it. The Matter is Treaſon in the higheſt Degree, the end to deprive the King of his Crown. The particular Treaſons are theſe: Firſt, To raiſe up Rebellion, and, to effect that, to procure Money to raiſe up Tumults in Scotland, by divulging a Treaſonable Book againſt the Kings Right to the Crown; the Purpoſe, to take away the Life of his Majeſty and his Iſſue. My Lord Cobham confeſſeth Sir Walter Raleigh to be guilty of all theſe Treaſons. The Queſtion is, Whether he be guilty as joyning with him, or inſtigating of him? The Courſe to prove this was by my Lord Cobham's Accuſation. If that be true, he is guilty; if not, he is clear. So whether Cobham ſay true, or Raleigh? that is the Queſtion. Raleigh hath no Anſwer, but the Shadow of as much Wit, as the Wit of Man can deviſe. He uſeth his bare Denial; the Denial of a Defendant muſt not move the Jury. In the Star-Chamber, or in the Chancery, for matter of Title, if the Defendant be called in Queſtion, his Denial on his Oath is no Evidence to the Court to clear him, he doth it in propria cauſa; therefore much leſs in matters of Treaſon. Cobham's Teſtification againſt him before then, and ſince, hath been largely diſcourſed.

Raleigh. If Truth be conſtant, and Conſtancy be in Truth, why hath he forſworn that that he hath ſaid? You have not proved any one thing againſt me by by direct Proofs, but all by Circumſtances.

Attourney. Have you done? The King muſt have the laſt.

Raleigh. Nay, Mr. Attourney, he which ſpeaketh for his Life, muſt ſpeak laſt. Falſe Repetitions and Miſtakings muſt not mar my Cauſe. You ſhould ſpeak ſecundum allegata & probata. I appeal to God and the King in this Point, whether Cobham's Accuſation be ſufficient to condemn me?

Attourney. The Kings Safety and your Clearing cannot agree. I proteſt before God, I never knew a clearer Treaſon.

Raleigh. I never had intelligence with Cobham ſince I came to the Tower.

Attourney. Go to, I will lay thee upon thy Back, for the confidenteſt Traytor that ever came at a Bar. Why ſhould you take 8000 Crowns for a Peace?

Lord Cecil. Be not ſo impatient good Mr. Attourney, give him leave to ſpeak.

Attourney. If I may not be patiently heard, you will incourage Traytors, and diſcourage us. I am the King's ſworn Servant, and muſt ſpeak: If he be guilty, he is a Traytor; if not, deliver him.

Nota. Here Mr. Attourney ſat down in a Chafe, and would ſpeak no more, until the Commiſſioners urged and intreated him. After much ado he went on, and made a long Repetition of all the Evidence, for the direction of the Jury; and at the repeating of ſome things Sir Walter Raleigh interrupted him, and ſaid, He did him wrong.

Attourney. Thou art the moſt vile and execrable Traytor that ever lived.

Raleigh. You ſpeak indiſcreetly, barbarouſly and uncivilly.

Attourney. I want words ſufficent to expreſs thy viperous Treaſons.

Raleigh. I think you want words indeed, for you have ſpoken one thing half a dozen times.

Attourney. Thou art an odious Fellow, thy Name is hateful to all the Realm of England for thy Pride.

Raleigh. It will go near to prove a meaſuring Caſt between you and me, Mr. Attourney.

Attourney. Well, I will now make it appear to the World, that there never lived a viler Viper upon the face of the Earth than thou, and therewithal he drew a Letter out of his Pocket, ſaying further, My Lords, you ſhall ſee, this is an Agent that hath writ a Treatiſe againſt the Spaniard, and hath ever ſo deteſted him; this is he that hath ſpent ſo much money againſt him in ſervice; and yet you ſhall all ſee whether his Heart be not wholly Spaniſh. The Lord Cobham, who of his own nature was a good and honourable Gentleman, till overtaken by this Wretch, now finding his Conſcience heavily burthened with ſome Courſes which the Subtilty of this Traytor had drawn him into, my Lords, he could be at no reſt with himſelf, nor quiet in his thoughts, until he was eaſed of that heavy weight; out of which Paſſion of his Mind, and diſcharge of his Duty to his Prince, and his Conſcience to God; taking it upon his Salvation that he wrote nothing but the Truth, with his own hands he wrote this Letter. Now Sir you ſhall ſee whether you had intelligence with Cobham, within four days before he came to the Tower. If he be wholly Spaniſh, that deſired a Penſion of 1500 Pound a Year from Spain, that Spain by him might have intelligence, then Raleigh is a Traytor. He hath taken an Apple, and pinned a Letter unto it, and threw it into my Lord Cobham's Window; the Contents whereof were this, It is doubtful, whether we ſhall be proceeded with or no, perhaps you ſhall not be tryed. This was to get a Retractation. Oh! it was Adam's Apple, whereby the Devil did deceive him. Further he wrote thus, Do not as my Lord of Eſſex did; take heed of a Preacher; for by his perſwaſion he confeſſed, and made himſelf guilty. I doubt not but this day God ſhall have as great a Conqueſt by this Traytor, and the Son of God ſhall be as much glorified, as when it was ſaid, Viciſti Galilee; you know my meaning. What though Cobham retracted, yet he could not reſt nor ſleep till he confirmed it again. If this be not enough to prove him a Traytor, the King my Maſter ſhall not live three years to an end.

Nota. Here Mr. Attourney produced the Lord Cobham's Letter, and as he read it, inſerted ſome ſpeeches.

'I have thought fit to ſet down this to 'my Lords, wherein I proteſt on my Soul 'to write nothing but the truth. I am now 'come near the period of my time, there'fore I confeſs the whole Truth before 'God, and his Angels. Raleigh, four days 'before I came from the Tower, cauſed an 'Apple (Eves Apple) to be thrown in 'at my Chamber Window; the effect of it 'was to entreat me to right the wrong that 'I had done him, in ſaying, that I ſhould 'have come home by Jerſey; which under 'my hand to him I have retracted. His 'firſt Letter I anſwered not, which was 'thrown in the ſame manner, wherein he 'prayed me to write him a Letter, which 'I did. He ſent me word that the Judges 'met at Mr. Attourney's Houſe, and that 'there was good hope the Proceedings 'againſt us ſhould be ſtayed; He ſent me 'another time a little Tobacco. At A'remberg's coming, Raleigh was to have pro-

'cured a Penſion of fifteen hundred Pounds a 'Year; for which he promiſed that no A-'ction ſhould be againſt Spain, the Low-'Countries, or the Indies, but he would 'give knowledge before-hand. He told me 'the States had Audience with the King. '(Attourney. Ah! is not this a Spaniſh 'Heart in an Engliſh Body?) He hath been 'the Original Cauſe of my Ruine; for I 'had no dealing with Aremberg, but by his 'inſtigation. He hath alſo been the cauſe 'of my Diſcontentment; he adviſed me 'not to be overtaken with Preachers, as 'Eſſex was; and that the King would better 'allow of a conſtant denial, than to ac-'cuſe any.

Attourney. Oh damnable Atheiſt! he hath learned ſome Text of Scripture to ſerve his own purpoſe, but falſly alledged. He counſels him not to be counſelled by Preachers, as Eſſex was: He died the Child of God, God honoured him at his death; thou waſt by when he died. Et Lupus & turpes inſtant morientibus Urſæ. He died indeed for his Offence. The King himſelf ſpake theſe words; He that ſhall ſay Eſſex died not for Treaſon is puniſhable.

Raleigh. You have heard a ſtrange Tale of a ſtrange Man. Now he thinks, he hath matter enough to deſtroy me; but the King, and all of you ſhall witneſs, by our Deaths, which of us was the ruine of the other. I bid a poor Fellow throw in the Letter at his Window, written to this purpoſe, You know you have undone me, now write three Lines to juſtifie me. In this I will die, that he hath done me wrong: Why did not he acquaint me with his Treaſons, if I acquainted him with my Diſpoſitions?

Lord Chief Juſtice. But what ſay you now of the reſt of the Letter, and the Penſion of 1500 l. per annum?

Raleigh. I ſay that Cobham is a baſe diſhonourable poor Soul.

Attourny. Is he baſe? I return it into thy Throat, on his behalf: But for thee, he had been a good Subject.

Lord Chief Juſtice. I perceive you are not ſo clear a Man, as you have proteſted all this while; for you ſhould have diſcovered theſe matters to the King.

Nota. Here Raleigh pulled a Letter out of his Pocket, which the Lord Cobham had written to him, and deſired my Lord Cecil to read it, becauſe he only knew his hand; the Effect of it was as followeth.

Cobham's Letter of Juſtification to Raleigh

'Seeing my ſelf ſo near my End, for the 'diſcharge of my own Conſcience; and free-'ing my ſelf from your Blood, which elſe 'will cry Vengeance againſt me: I pro-'teſt upon my Salvation, I never pra-'ctiſed with Spain by your procurement; 'God ſo comfort me in this my Affliction, as you are a true Subject for any 'thing that I know. I will ſay as Daniel, 'Purus ſum à ſanguine hujus. So God have 'mercy on my Soul, as I know no Treaſon by you.

Raleigh. Now I wonder how many Souls this Man hath! he damns one in this Letter, and another in that.

Here was much ado, Mr. Attourney alledged that his laſt Letter was politickly and cunningly urged from the Lord Cobham, and that the firſt was ſimply the Truth; and that leſt it ſhould ſeem doubtful that the firſt Letter was drawn from my Lord Cobham by promiſe of mercy, or hope of favour, the Lord Chief Juſtice willed that the Jury might herein be ſatisfied.

Whereupon the Earl of Devonſhire delivered that the ſame was meer voluntary, and not extracted from the Lord Cobham upon any hopes or promiſe of Pardon.

Nota. This was the laſt Evidence: whereupon a Marſhal was ſworn to keep the Jury preſent. The Jury departed, and ſtaid not a quarter of an hour, but returned; and gave their Verdict, Guilty.

Serj. Heale demanded Judgment againſt the Priſoner.

Clerk of the Crown. Sir Walter Raleigh, Thou haſt been indicted, arraigned, and pleaded not Guilty, for all theſe ſeveral Treaſons, and for tryal thereof haſt put thy ſelf upon thy Country; which Country are theſe, who have found thee guilty. What canſt thou ſay for thy ſelf, why Judgment and Execution of Death ſhould not paſs againſt thee?

Raleigh. My Lords, the Jury have found me Guilty. They muſt do as they are directed. I can ſay nothing why Judgment ſhould not proceed. You ſee whereof Cobham hath accuſed me. You remember his Proteſtations, that I was never guilty. I deſire the King ſhould know of the Wrongs done unto me ſince I came hither.

Lord Chief Juſtice. You have had no wrong, Sir Walter.

Raleigh. Yes, of Mr. Attourney. I deſire my Lords to remember three things to the King. 1. I was accuſed to be a Practiſer with Spain. I never knew that my Lord Cobham meant to go thither; I will ask no mercy mercy at the Kings hands if he will affirm it. 2. I never knew of the practice with Arabella. 3. I never knew of my Lord Cobham's practice with Aremberg, nor of the ſurpriſing Treaſon.

Lord Ch. Juſtice. In my Conſcience I am perſwaded that Cobham hath accuſed you truly. You cannot deny but that you were dealt with to have a Penſion to be a Spy for Spain; therefore you are not ſo true to the King as you have proteſted your ſelf to be.

Raleigh. I ſubmit my ſelf to the King's Mercy; I know his Mercy is greater than my Offence. I recommend my Wife, and Son of tender years, unbrought up, to his Compaſſion.

Lord Chief Juſtice. I had thought I ſhould never have ſeen this Day, to have ſtood in this place to give Sentence of Death againſt you; becauſe I thought it impoſſible, that one of ſo great Parts ſhould have fallen ſo grievouſly. God hath beſtowed on you many Benefits. You had been a Man fit and able to have ſerved the King in good Place. You had brought your ſelf into a good State of living, if you had entred into a good Conſideration of your Eſtate, and not ſuffered your own Wit to have entrapped your ſelf, you might have lived in good comfort. It is beſt for Man not to ſeek to climb too high, leſt he fall; nor yet to creep too low, leſt he be trodden on. It was the Poſie of the wiſeſt and greateſt Counſellor of our time in England, In medio ſpatio mediocria firma locantur. You might have lived well with 3000 Pound a Year, for ſo I have heard your Revennes to be. I know nothing might move you to be diſcontented; but if you had been down, you know Fortunes Wheel, when it is turned about, riſeth again. I never heard that the King took away any thing from you, but the Captainſhip of the Guard, which he did with very good Reaſon, to have one of his one knowledge, whom he might truſt, in that Place. You have been taken for a wiſe Man, and ſo have ſhewed Wit enough this Day. Again, for Monopolies for Wine, &c. If the King had ſaid, it is a matter that offends my People, ſhould I burthen them for your private Good? I think you could not well take it hardly, that his Subjects were eaſed, though by your private hindrance. Two Vices have lodged chiefly in you; one is an eager Ambition, the other corrupt Covetouſneſs. Ambition in deſiring to be advanced to equal Grace and Favour, as you have been before-time; that Grace you had then you got not in a Day or Year. For your Covetouſneſs, I am ſorry to hear that a Gentleman of your Wealth ſhould become a baſe Spy for the Enemy, which is the vileſt of all other; wherein on my Conſcience Cobham hath ſaid true; by it you would have increaſed your Living 1500 Pound a Year. This Covetouſneſs is like a Canker, that eats the Iron Place where it lives. Your Caſe being thus, let it not grieve you, if I ſpeak a little out of zeal, and love to your good. You have been taxed by the World, with the Defence of the moſt Heatheniſh and Blaſphemous opinions, which I liſt not to repeat, becauſe Chriſtian Ears cannot endure to hear them, nor the Authors and Maintainers of them ſuffered to live in any Chriſtian Common-Wealth. You know what Men ſaid of Harpool. You ſhall do well before you go out of the World to give ſatisfaction therein, and not to die with theſe Imputations on you. Let not any Devil perſwade you to think there is no Eternity in Heaven: for if you think thus, you ſhall find Eternity in Hell-Fire. In the firſt Accuſation of my Lord Cobham, I obſerved his manner of ſpeaking; I proteſt before the living God, I am perſwaded he ſpoke nothing but the Truth. You wrote that he ſhould not in any caſe confeſs any thing to a Preacher, telling him an Example of my Lord of Eſſex, that noble Earl that is gone; who if he had not been carried away with others, had lived in Honour to this day among us. He confeſſed his Offences, and obtained Mercy of the Lord, for I am verily perſwaded in my Heart, he died a worthy Servant of God. Your conceit of not confeſſing any thing is very inhumane and wicked. In this World is the time of Confeſſing, that we may be abſolved at the Day of Judgment. You have ſhewed a fearful ſign of denying God, in adviſing a Man not to confeſs the Truth. It now comes in my mind, why you may not have your Accuſer come face to face: for ſuch an one is eaſily brought to retract, when he ſeeth there is no hope of his own Life. It is dangerous that any Traytors ſhould have any Acceſs to, or Conference with one another; when they ſee themſelves muſt die, they will think it beſt to have their Fellow live, that he may commit the like Treaſon again, and ſo in ſome ſort ſeek Revenge.

Now it reſteth to pronounce the Judgment, which I wiſh you had not been this day to have received of me: For if the fear of God in you had been anſwerable to your other great Parts, you might have lived to have been a ſingular good Subject. I never ſaw the like Tryal, and hope I ſhall never ſee the like again.

The Judgment.

But ſince you have been found guilty of theſe horrible Treaſons, the Judgment of this Court is, That you ſhall be had from hence to the Place whence you came, there to remain until the day of Execution; and from thence you ſhall be drawn upon a Hurdle through the open Streets to the place of Execution, there to be hanged and cut down alive, and your Body ſhall be opened, your Heart and Bowels pluckt out, and your Privy Members cut off, and thrown into the fire before your Eyes; then your Head to be ſtrucken off from your Body, and your Body ſhall be divided into four Quarters, to be diſpoſed of at the King's Pleaſure: And God have Mercy upon your Soul.

Sir Walter Raleigh beſought the Earl of Devonſhire, and the Lords to be Suiters on his behalf to the King; that in regard of Places of Eſtimation he did bear in his Majeſties time, the Rigour of his Judgment might be qualified, and his Death honourable, and not ignominious.

Wherein after they had promiſed him to do their utmoſt Endeavours, the Court roſe, and the Priſoner was carried up again to the Caſtle.

Here follows the Continuation of the Life.

IT was obſerved, that before the Lords (principally to my Lord Cecil) at Wincheſter (for there he was tried, the Sickneſs then reigning in London) he was humble, but not proſtrate; dutiful, but not deject: For in ſome caſes he would humbly thank them for gracious Speeches; in others acknowledge that their Honours ſaid true, as in relating ſome Circumſtances. And in ſuch points wherein he would not yield unto them, he would crave pardon, and with reverence urge them, and anſwer them as in points of Law, or eſſential matters of Fact. To the Jury he was affable, but not fawning; hoping, but not truſting in them; carefully perſwading them with Reaſon, not diſtemperately importuning them with Conjuration; rather ſhewing love of Life, than fear of Death. What made ill for Sir Walter was his Diſcovery of Lawrency and Cobham's frequent private Conferences; which ſo incenſed Cobham, that he poſitively accuſed him: though the ſingle Evidence of one already convicted of what Sir Walter was but yet impeached, could only make a Circumſtance, and not convict him. The Judges and the King's Counſel did what they could to bawl him out of his Life; and ſince they wanted Proof, they would endeavour to tire him out. If we may believe Osborn, ſeveral of the Jurymen, after he was caſt, were ſo far touch'd in Conſcience as to ask of him pardon on their Knees.

A further Confirmation of his Innocency may be a Paſſage of his own in a Letter to Secretary Winwood, wherein he tells him, 'That the worthy Prince of 'Wales was extream curious in ſearching 'out the nature of his Offences. The 'Queens Majeſty had informed her 'ſelf from the beginning. The King of 'Denmark at both times of his being here, 'was throughly ſatisfied of his Innocency; 'they would otherwiſe never have moved 'his Majeſty on his behalf. The Wife, 'the Brother, and the Son of a King do 'not uſe to ſue for Men ſuſpect. Nay, further yet, the Scots themſelves declar'd in favour of him, if we may believe him in another Letter of his to Sir Robert Car, after Earl of Somerſet, wherein are theſe words: 'I have ever been bound to your 'Nation, as well for many other Graces, 'as for the true Report of my Trial to the 'King's Majeſty, againſt whom had I been 'malignant, the hearing of my Cauſe 'could not have changed Enemies into 'Friends, Malice into Compaſſion, and 'the Minds of the greateſt number then 'preſent into Commiſeration of mine E'ſtate: It is not the nature of ſoul Trea'ſon to beget ſuch fair Paſſions; neither 'could it agree with the duty and love of 'faithful Subjects (eſpecially of your Na'tion) to bewail his Overthrow that had 'conſpired againſt their moſt natural and 'liberal Lord.

Two days after Raleigh's Tryal, were ſentenced Brook, who pretended his intention was only to try faithful Subjects, and ſaid he had a Commiſſion for ſo doing, but produc'd it not; Markham, who confeſt the Indictment, pleaded Diſcontent, and deſired Mercy; Watſon, who confeſt he drew them all in, holding the King to be no Sovereign till he were crown'd, inſtancing in Saul and Jeroboam; And

Clark,

Clark, who ſaid the like. Parham and Brookſby were acquitted by the Jury: Watſon, Clark, and Brook were executed; Markham, Cobham, and Grey brought ſeverally on the Scaffold to dye, and at the inſtant on the Block, had their particular Executions remitted, by a Letter to the Sheriff under the King's own Hand, without the knowledge of any, ſays Mr. Gibs, Gentleman of the Bedchamber, that brought it. However an evil Fate did attend theſe Men; Grey died in the Tower, the laſt of his Line; the reſt were diſcharg'd but died miſerably poor: Markham and ſome others abroad; but Cobham (as Osborn tells us) in a Room aſcended by a Ladder, at a poor Womans Houſe in the Minories (formerly his Landreſs) died rather of hunger than a natural diſeaſe.

Sir Walter was left to his Majeſties Mercy, who thought him too great a Malecontent to have his Freedom, and probably too Innocent to loſe his Life. Therefore in the Tower he is confin'd, but permitted to enjoy Liberam Cuſtodiam; where he improv'd his Impriſonment to the greateſt advantage of Learning and Inquiſitive Men. Since his Majeſty had civilly buried him, and as it were baniſh'd him this World, he thought it no Treaſon to diſturb the Aſhes of former times, and bring to view the Actions of deceaſed Heroes. And certainly none was ſo fit to comment on their Atchievements, and ſo able to raiſe excellent Maxims from them, as he who had been brought up in ſo wiſe a Court as Queen Elizabeth's, and read ſo many wiſe Men. After ſome time paſt there, he was delivered of that great Minerva, the Hiſtory of the World; a Book which for the Exactneſs of its Chronology, Curiouſneſs of its Contexture and Learning of all Sorts, ſeems to be the Work of an Age. An Hiſtory which never yet met with a Detractor, and was the Envy, if ſome Authors may be credited, of King James himſelf, who thought none could out-do him at the Pen. That a Man who had been the greateſt part of his life taken up in Action, ſhould write ſo judiciouſly, ſo critically of Times and Actions, is as great a Wonder as the Book it ſelf. It ſtill remains a Diſpute whether the Age he lived in was more obliged to his Pen or his Sword, the one being buſie in conquering the New, the other in ſo bravely deſcribing the Old World. An Hiſtory wherein the only fault, or defect rather, is, that it wanteth one half thereof; which was occaſioned, as our Story tells us, thus: Some few days before he ſuffered, he ſent for Mr. Walter Burr, who formerly Printed his firſt Volume of the Hiſtory of the World, whom taking by the Hand, after ſome other Diſcourſe, he ask'd how it had ſold? Mr. Burr returned this Anſwer, It ſold ſo ſlowly that it had undone him. At which words of his Sir Walter ſtepping to his Desk, reaches his other unprinted Part of his Hiſtory, which he had brought down to the Times he lived in, and clapping his hands upon his breaſt, ſaid with a ſigh, Ah, my Friend, hath the firſt Part undone thee? the ſecond Part ſhall undo no more; this ungrateful World is unworthy of it: and immediately going to the Fire-ſide, threw it in, and ſet his foot upon it till it was conſumed. As great a loſs to Learning as Chriſtendom could have ſuſtained; the greater, becauſe it could be repaired by no hand but his. It often happening to Authors, as to great Maſters in Painting, their Pieces are not valued till they are dead, and the ſucceeding Age find the Originals inimitable.

Whilſt Sir Walter was thus confined, Death took away his and Eſſex's mortal Enemy, Sir Robert Cecil, after Earl of Salisbury, who had purchaſed the monopoly of Favour, and being jealous of Sir Walter's Parts, had ſome fear he might ſupplant him; which was the Cauſe, according to Osborn, that he was brought to the aforementioned Tryal. However Sir Walter outlived his Enemies deſigns and hatred, and for all his kindneſſes beſtowed upon him the following Epitaph, which I am upon very good grounds aſſured to be his. King James was ſo much taken with the ſmartneſs of it, that he hoped the Author would die before him. The Verſes are theſe:

Here lies Hobinal, our Paſtor while here,
That once in a quarter our fleeces did ſhear.
To pleaſe us, his Cur he kept under clogg,
And was ever after both Shepherd and Dog.
For Oblation to Pan his Cuſtom was thus,
He firſt gave a triſle, then offer'd up us.
And through his falſe Worſhip ſuch pow'r he did gain,
As kept him'oth Mountain, and us on the Plain:
Where many a Hornpipe he tun'd to his Phillis,
And ſweetly ſung Walſingham to's Amarillis;
Till Atropos clapt him, a Pox on the Drab,
For ſpight of his Tar-box he dy'd of the Scab.

If the Reader deſires a Key to theſe Verſes, he may meet with it in Osborn's Memoires, who yet for all his Intelligence hath not informed us that his Miſtreſſes name was Walſingham.

Fourteen

Fourteen Years Sir Walter had ſpent in the Tower, and being weary of a ſtate wherein he could be only ſerviceable by his Pen, but not in a capacity of ſerving and enriching his Country any other way (of whom Prince Henry would ſay, that no King but his Father would keep ſuch a Bird in a Cage;) At length he fell upon an Enterprize of a Golden Mine in Guiana in the Southern parts of America. The Propoſition of this was preſented and recommended to his Majeſty by Sir Ralph Winwood the Secretary of State, as a Matter not in the Air, or Speculative, but Real, and of certainty: for that Sir Walter had ſeen of the Ore of the Mine, and tried the richneſs of it, having gotten a pound from thence by the hands of Captain Kemiſh his ancient Servant.

Sir Ralph Winwood's Recommendations of the Deſign, and the earneſt Sollicitations for his Enlargement, of the Queen, the Prince, and the French Lieger (with much affection to his Deſerts, not without ſome Politick Deſigns on Spain) together with the Aſſeverations of Sir Walter of the truth of the Mine, work'd upon his Majeſty, who thought himſelf in Honour obliged, nay in a a manner ingaged (as the Declaration which he publiſhed after the Death of Sir Walter tells us) not to deny unto his People the Adventure and Hope of ſo great Riches to be ſought and atchieved at the Charge of Voluntiers, eſpecially ſince it ſtood ſo well with his Majeſties Politick and Magnanimous Courſes, in theſe his flouriſhing Times of Peace, to nouriſh and encourage Noble and Generous Enterprizes for Plantations, Diſcoveries, and opening of a new Trade.

Count Gondamor (an active and ſubtile Inſtrument to ſerve his Maſter's ends) took Allarm at this, and repreſented to his Majeſty the Enterprize of Sir Walter to be hoſtile, and predatory, intending a breach of the Peace between the two Crowns. But notwithſtanding, Power at laſt is granted to Sir Walter to ſet forth Ships and Men for that Service. However, the King commanded him upon pain of his Allegiance to give him under his Hand (promiſing on the word of a King to keep it ſecret) the number of his Men, the burthen and ſtrength of his Ships; together with the Country and River which he was to enter; which being done accordingly by Sir Walter, that very Original Paper was found in the Spaniſh Governours Cloſet at St. Thoma. So active were the Spaniſh Miniſters, that Advertiſement was ſent to Spain, and thence to the Indies, before the Engliſh Fleet got out of the Thames.

But as we have juſt Cauſe to admire the more than uſual Activity of the Spaniſh Agents, ſo may we wonder no leſs at the Miſcarriage of his Majeſties preſent Miniſters, who notwithſtanding he had paſt his Royal Word to the contrary, yet they did help Count Gondamor to that very Paper; So much both King and Court were at Gondamor's ſervice.

A Commiſſion indeed is granted, but by Gondamor's means is limited; that the Fleet ſhould commit no Outrages upon the King of Spain's Subjects by Land, unleſs they began firſt; with other limitations in the Commiſſion, which for the Rearders Curioſity and Satisfaction I have here inſerted.

James

JAMES, by the Grace of GOD, &c. To all to whom these presents shall come, to be read, heard, or seen, and to every of them greeting: Whereas Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, intendeth to undertake a Voyage by Sea and Shipping, unto the South parts of America, or elsewhere within America, possessed and inhabited by Heathen and Savage People; to the end, to discover and find out some Commodities and Merchandizes in those Countries, that be necessary and profitable for the Subjects of these Our Kingdoms and Dominions, whereof the Inhabitants there make little or no use or estimation; whereupon also may ensue by Trade and Commerce, some propagation of the Christian Faith, and reformed Religion amongst those Savage and Idolatrous People: And whereas We are credibly informed, that there are divers Merchants and owners of Ships, and others, well disposed to assist the said Sir Walter Raleigh in this his Enterprise, had they sufficient Assurance to enjoy their due parts of the Profits returned (in respect of the Peril of Law wherein the said Sir Walter Raleigh now standeth:) And whereas also We are informed, that divers other Gentlemen, the Kinsmen and Friends of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and divers Captains and other Commanders, are also desirous to follow him, and to adventure their Lives with him in this his Journey, so as they might be commanded by no other than himself.

Know ye, that We, upon deliberate Consideration had of the Premisses, being desirous by all ways and means to work and procure the benefit and good of Our loving Subjects, and to give our Princely furtherance to the said Sir Walter Raleigh, his Friends and Associates herein, to the Incouragement of others in the like laudable Journeys and Enterprizes, to be hereafter prosecuted and pursued; and especially in advancement and furtherance, as well of the Conversion of Savage People, as of the increase of Trade, Traffique, and Merchandizes used by Our Subjects of this Our Kingdom, being most famous throughout all Nations: Of Our special Grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, have given and granted, and by these Presents for Us, Our Heirs, and Successors, do give and grant unto the said Sir Walter Raleigh, full Power and Authority, and free Licence and Liberty out of this our Realm of England, or any other Our Dominions, to have, carry, take, and lead for and towards his said intended Voyage unto the said South parts, or other parts of America, (possessed and inhabited, as aforesaid) and to Travel thither, all such, and so many of Our loving Subjects, or any other Strangers that will become Our loving Subjects, and live under Our Obeysance and Allegiance, as shall willingly accompany him, with sufficient Shipping, Armour, Weapons, Ordnance, Munition, Powder, Shot, Habiliments, Victuals, and such Wares and Merchandizes, as are esteemed by the wild People in those parts, Cloathing, Implements, Furniture, Cattle, Horses, and Mares, and all other such things as he shall think most necessary for his Voyage, and for the use and defence of him and his Company, and Trade with the People there; and in passing and returning to and fro, and in those parts, to give away, Sell, Barter, Exchange, or otherwise dispose of the same Goods, Merchandizes, and Provisions, to the most benefit, and at the will and pleasure of the said Sir Walter Raleigh and his Company, and such other Person, or Persons, as shall be Adventurers or Assistants with, or unto him in this his intended Voyage, and from thence to Return, Import, Convey, and bring into this Our Kingdom, or any other Our Dominions, such Gold, Silver, Bullion, or any other Wares, or Merchandizes, or Commodities whatsoever, as they shall think most fit and convenient; and the same being so Returned, Imported, Conveyed, and Brought into this Our Kingdom, or any other Our Dominions, to have, take, keep, retain, and convert to the only proper Use, Benefit, and Behoof of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and his said Company, and other Persons Adventurers and Assistants with, or to him in his Voyage, without the Lett, Interruption, Molestation, and Disturbance of Us, Our Heirs or Successors, or any the Officers, or Ministers of Us, Our Heirs or Successors whatsoever; Paying and Answering unto Us, Our Heirs, and Successors, the full fifth part, in five parts to be divided, of all such Gold, and Silver, and Bullion, and Ore of Gold, or Silver, and Pearl, and precious Stones, as shall be Imported over and besides; and together with such Customs, Subsidies, and other Duties, as shall be due for, or in respect of any other Goods, Wares, or Merchandizes whatsoever to be so Imported by the true meaning of these

Presens

Presents. And to the end the said Sir Walter Raleigh may be the more Encouraged to go forward in this his Enterprise, and all Our loving Subjects desirous to be Adventurers with him, or Assistant unto him, may be the more incited to further his Proceedings: We do hereby in verbo Regio, for Us, Our heirs and Successors, Covenant, Promise, and Grant, to and with the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and all other Persons that shall accompany him, or to be attendant upon him, or to be Adventurers or Assistants with, or to him in this his Voyage, that no Gold, Silver, Goods, Wares, or Merchandises whatsoever, of what kind or sort soever, by him or them, or any of them to be Imported into this Our Kingdom of England, or any other Our Dominions, from any the said South, or other parts of America, (Possessed or Inhabited, as aforesaid) shall be attached, seized, or taken by Us, Our heirs or Successors, or to the use of Us, Our heirs or Successors, or by any the Officers or Ministers of Us, Our heirs or Successors whatsoever; But that the same, and every of them (the fifth part of the said Gold, Silver, or Bullion, and Ore of Gold and Silver, and Pearl, and pretious Stones, and other the Customs and Duties aforesaid, being truly answered and payed) shall be, and remain to the sole and proper use and behoof of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and his said Company, and such Persons as shall be Adventurers with him, or Assistant to him in this his Voyage; any Law, Statute, Act of Parliament, Proclamation, Provision, or Restraint, or any Right, Title, or Claim of Us, Our heirs or Successors, or any other matter or thing whatsoever to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. And further, of Our more especial Grace, certain Knowledge, and meer Motion, We do hereby for Us, Our heirs and Successors, ordain, constitute and appoint the said Sir Walter Raleigh to be the sole Governour and Commander of all Persons that shall travel, or be with him in the said Voyage, to the said South, or other parts of America, (so possessed and inhabited as aforesaid) or in returning from thence. And we do hereby give unto him full Power and Authority to Correct, Punish, Pardon, Govern, and Rule them, or any of them, according to such Orders, Ordinances, Constitutions, Directions, and Instructions, as by the said Sir Walter Raleigh shall be from time to time Established, as well in cases Capital and Criminal, as Civil, both Marine and other; So always as the said Statutes, Ordinances, and Proceedings (as near as conveniently may be) be agreeable to the Laws, Statutes, Government and Policy of this Our Realm of England, and not against the true Christian Faith now professed in the Church of England. And because that in such and the like Enterprises and Voyages, great Inconveniencies have grown by the mutinous and disorderly carriage of the Mariners and Soldiers employed in the same, for want of sufficient Authority to punish them according to their Offences; We do therefore by these Presents for Us, Our heirs and Successors, give full Power and Authority to the said Sir Walter Raleigh, in case of Rebellion or Mutiny by Sea or Land, to use and exercise Martial Law (upon just ground and apparent necessity) in as large and ample manner as our Lieutenant General by Sea or Land, or our Lieutenants in Our Counties, within Our Realm of England, have, had, or ought to have by force of their Commission of Lieutenancy. And we do further by these Presents, give full Power and Authority to the said Sir Walter Raleigh, to Collect, Nominate and Appoint such Captains, and other inferiour Commanders and Ministers under him, as shall be requisite for the better ordering and governing of his Company, and the good of the Voyage. And further, We do by these Presents, for Us, Our heirs and Successors, straightly Charge and Command the Warden of Our Cinque Ports, and all the Customers, Comptrollers, Surveyers, Searchers, Waiters, and other Officers and Ministers of Us, Our heirs and Successors, for the time being, that they and every of them do quietly permit and suffer the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and all Person and Persons that shall be willing to Travel and Adventure with him in this Voyage with their Ships, Munition, Goods, Wares, and Merchandizes whatsoever out of this Our Realm, or any other Our Dominions, to pass into the said South or other parts of America, (Possessed and Inhabited as aforesaid) and from thence to return and import into this Our Realm, or any other Our Dominions, any Goods, Wares, or Merchandizes whatsoever, and there to Sell, or otherwise dispose of the same, to the best benefit and advantage, and to the only use and behoof of the said Sir Walter Raleigh, and his Company, and such other Persons as shall be Adventurers with him in this Voyage; paying ing

ing the fifth part of all Gold, and Silver, and Bullion, and Ore of Gold, and Silver, and of Pearl, and pretious Stones imported, and other the Customs and Duties aforesaid. And these Presents, or the Inrolement thereof, shall be unto the said Wardens of the Cinque Ports, Customers, Comptrollers, and other the Officers and Ministers aforesaid, for the time being, a sufficient Warrant and Discharge in that behalf. And Our Will and Pleasure is; And by these Presents, for Us, Our Heirs and Successors, We do grant unto the said Sir Walter Raleigh, That these Our Letters Patents, or the Inrolment thereof, and all and singular Grants, Clauses, and things therein contained, shall be firm, strong, sufficient, and effectual in Law, according to Our gracious Pleasure and Meaning herein expressed; Any Law, Statute, Act, Provision, Ordinance, or Restraint, or any other Matter or Thing to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding. Although express mention, &c. In Witness whereof, &c. Witness Our Self at Westminster the six and twentieth Day of August, in the fourteenth Year of Our Reign of England, France, and Ireland, and of Scotland the fiftieth.

Per breve de privato Sigillo.

With this Commission, and the Company of several brave Captains, and other Knights and Gentlemen of great Blood and Worth, he set out in Quest of the Mine, with a compleat Fleet of Twelve Sail; letting fall a Speech at his Departure, which was rather an Argument of his Wit than his Wisdom, That his whole History of the World had not the like President: Of a Kings Prisoner to purchase Freedom, and his bosome Favorite to have the Halter; but in Scripture, Mordecai and Haman: Meaning himself and the Duke of Sommerset. To which he was told, that the King replied, He might die in that Deceit; which he did, for Sommerset was saved. Of whom was made good what Sir Walter used to say of Favourites; That Minions were not so happy as Vulgar Judgments thought them, being frequently commanded to uncomely, and sometimes to unnatural Imployments.

On the 17th of November, he arrived at Guiana, having been much retarded by contrary Winds, and having lost several of his Voluntiers in the Voyage, by a violent Calenture. But of the whole Transactions, Sir Walter hath given us an exact Account, in his Letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, Secretary; which I have here transcribed.

SIR,

AS I have not hitherto given you any Account of our Proceedings and Passages towards the Indies, so have I no other Subject to write of, than of the greatest Misfortunes that ever befell any Man. For whereas for the first, all those that navigate between Cape de Verd, and America, do pass between Fifteen or Twenty Days at most, we found the Wind so contrary, and (which are also contrary to Nature) so many Storms and Rains, as we spent six Weeks in the Passage; by reason whereof, and that in so great Heat, we wanted Water. For at the Isle Prano of Cape de Verd, we lost our Anchors and Cables, and our Water-Casks; and being driven from the Isle with a Hurricane, we were like all to have perished. Great sickness fell amongst us, and carried away great numbers of our ablest Men, both for Sea and Land. The 17th of November, we had sight of Guiana, and soon after came to Anchor in five Degrees of the River Galliano; here we staid till the fourth of December, landed our Sick-men, set up our Barges and Shallops, which were brought out of England in Quarters, washed our Ships, and took in Fresh-water, being fed and cherished by the Indians of my old Acquaintance, with a great deal of Love and Respect. My self being in the hands of Death this six Weeks, and not able otherwise to move, than as I was carried in a Chair, gave order to five small Ships to sail into Orinoque, having Captain Kemish for their Conductor towards the Mines: And in those five Ships, five Companies of fifty, under the Command of Captain Parker, Captain North, Brethren to the Lord Monteagle, and the Lord North, valiant Gentlemen, and of infinite Patience, for the Labour, Hunger, and Heat which they have endured: My Son had the third Company; Captain Thornix of Kent the fourth Company; Captain Chidly, by his Lieutenant, the fifth. But as my Serjeant Major, Captain Piggot, died in the former miserable Passage; so my Lieutenant Sir Warham Saint Leiger, lay sick without hope of Life, and the Charge conferred on my Nephew, George Raleigh, who had alſo ſerved long with infinite Commendations; but by reaſon of my abſence, and of Sir Warham's, was not ſo well obeyed as the Enterpriſe required. As they paſſed up the River, the Spaniards began the War, and ſhot at us, both with their Ordnance and Muskets; whereupon the Companies were forced to charge them, and ſoon after beat them out of the Town. In the Aſſault my Son (more deſirous of Honour than Safety) was ſlain; with whom, to ſay truth, all the reſpects of this World have taken end in me; and although theſe five Captains had as weak Companies as ever followed valiant Leaders, yet were there among them ſome twenty or thirty valiant adventurous Gentlemen, and of ſingular Courage; as of my Sons Company, Mr. Knivet, Mr. Hammond, Mr. Langworth, Mr. John Pleaſington; his Officers, Sir John Hambden, Mr. Simon Leak, Corporal of the Field, Mr. Hammond, the elder Brother, Mr. Nicholas of Buckingham, Mr. Roberts of Kent, Mr. Perin, Mr. Treſham, Mr. Mollinax, Mr. Winter, and his Brother, Mr. Wray, Mr. Miles Herbert, Mr. Bradſhaw, Captain Hall, and others.

Sir, I have ſet down the Names of theſe Gentlemen, to the end that if his Majeſty ſhall have cauſe to uſe their ſervice, it may pleaſe you to take notice of them for very ſufficient Gentlemen. The other five Ships ſtaid at Trinidado, having no other Port capable of them near Guiana. The ſecond Ship was Commanded by my Vice-Admiral Captain John Pennington, of whom (to do him right) he is one of the ſufficienteſt Gentlemen for the Sea that England hath. The third by Sir Warham Saint Legier, an exceeding valiant and worthy Gentleman. The fourth by Sir John Fern. The fifth by Captain Chidley of Devon. With theſe five Ships I dayly attended their Armada of Spain, which had they ſet upon us, our Force divided, the one half in Orinoque, 150 Miles from us, we had not only been torn in pieces, but all thoſe in the River had alſo periſhed, being of no force at all for Sea-fight. But we had reſolved to be burnt by their ſides, had the Armada arrived: But belike they ſtaid for us at Margaret, by which they knew we muſt paſs to the Indies. For it pleaſed his Majeſty to value us at ſo little, as to command me upon my Allegiance, to ſet down under my hand the Country, and River by which I was to enter it; to ſet down the Number of my Men, and Burthen of my Ships, and what Ordnance every Ship carried: which being known to the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, and by him unto the King of Spain, a diſpatch was made, and Letters ſent from Madrid, before my departure out of the Thames. For his firſt Letter, ſent by a Barque of Advice, was dated the 19th of March, 1617. at Madrid, which Letter I have here incloſed ſent to your Honour; the reſt I reſerve, not knowing whether they may be intercepted or not. The ſecond by the King, dated the ſecond of May, ſent alſo by a Colonel of Diego de Polonioque, Governour of Guiana, Elderedo, and Trinidado. The third by the Biſhop of Pererícho, and delivered to Polonioque, the fifteenth of July at Trinidado. And the fourth was ſent from the Farmer and Secretary of his Cuſtoms in the Indies. At the ſame time by that of the Kings Hand ſent by the Biſhop, there was alſo a Commiſſion for the ſpeed Levying of 300 Souldiers, and ten Pieces of Ordnance, to be ſent from Portriche, for the Defence of Guiana. One 150 from Nueno Remo de Grando, under the Command of Captain Anthony Muſica; and the other 150 from Portricho, to be conducted by Captain Francis Landio.

Now Sir, if all that have traded to the Indies ſince his Majeſties time, knew that the Spaniards have flayed alive all the poor Men which they have taken, being but Merchant Men, what Death and cruel Torment ſhall we expect, if they conquer us? Certainly, they have hitherto failed groſly, being ſet out thence as we were, both for Number, Time, and Place.

Laſtly, To make an Apology for not working the Mine (though I know his Majeſty expected it, whom I am to ſatisfie as much as my ſelf) having loſt my Son and my Eſtate in the Enterprize; yet it is true, that the Spaniards took more care to defend the Paſſage leading unto it, than they did the Town, which by the King's Inſtructions they might eaſily do, the Countries being Aſpera & Nemoroſa.

But it is true, that when Captain Kemiſh found the River low, and that he could not approach the Banks in moſt places near the Mine by a Mile, and where he found a deſcent, a volley of Muſquet ſhot came from the Woods upon the Boat, and ſlew two Rowers, hurt ſix others, and ſhot a valiant Gentleman of Captain Thornix, of which wound he languiſheth to this day. He, to wit, Captain Kemiſh, following his own Advice, thought it was in vain to diſcover the Mine; and he gave me this for an Excuſe at his return, that the Companies of Engliſh in the Town of S. Thoma were not able to defend it againſt the daily and nightly Aſſaults of the Spaniards; that the Paſſages to the Mines were thick and unpaſſable Woods; and that the Mine being diſcovered, they had no

Men

Men to work it; did not discover it at all. For it is true, the Spaniards having two Gold Mines near the Town; the one possessed by Pedro Rodrigo de Paran, the second by Harmian Frotinio, the third of Silver by Captain Francisco, are useless for want of Negroes to work them: For as the Indians cannot be constrained, by a Law of Charles the 5th, so the Spaniards will not, nor can endure the labour of those Mines, whatsoever the Bragadocio the Spanish Ambassador saith. I shall prove under the Proprietors hands, by the Custom-Brook and the King's Quinto, of which I recovered an Ingot or two: I shall also make it appear to any Prince, or State, that will undertake it, how easily those Mines, and five or six more of them, may be possessed, and the most of them in those Parts, which have never as yet been attempted by any, nor by any Passage to them, nor ever discovered by the English, French, or Dutch. But at Kemish's return from Orinoque, when I rejected his counsel and his course, and told him he had undone me, and wounded my Credit with the King past recovery, he slew himself: For I told him, seeing my Son was slain, I cared not if I had lost one hundred more in opening the Mine, so my Credit had been saved. For I protest before God, had not Captain Whitny (to whom I gave more countenance than to all the Captains of my Fleet) run from me at the Granadoes, and carried another Ship with him of Captain Woolastons, I would have left my Body at Saint Thome, by my Sons, or have brought with me out of that or other Mines, so much Gold Ore as should have satisfied the King. I propounded no vain thing, what shall become of me I know not. I am unpardoned in England, and my poor Estate consumed, and whether any Prince will give me Bread or no, I know not. I would desire your Honour to hold me in your good Opinion, to remember my Service to my Lord of Arundel and Pembrook, to take some pity on my poor Wife, to whom I dare not write for renewing her sorrow for her Son. And I beseech you to give a Copy of this to my Lord Carew; for to a broken Mind, a sick Body, and weak Eyes, it is a torment to write many Letters. I have found many things of Importance for discovering the State and Weakness of the Indies, which if I live I shall hereafter impart unto your Honour, to whom I shall remain a faithful Servant,

WALTEER RALEIGH.

Whilst this Action of S. Thome was performed, and the Repulse in the way to the Mine, Sir Walter staid at S. Point de Gallo the space of nine weeks, where the unwelcome news was brought him of the loss of his Son, and the Defeat they met with in their Design upon the Mine. However this ill News could not alter the Resolutions of Sir Walter, of Returning to England, though he knew he should meet with several Enemies there, who had by their Calumnies rendred the Voyage nothing but a Design; and though several of his Men were for landing at New-found-Land. For if we may believe himself at the hour of his Death, the two Noble Earls, Thomas of Arundel, and William of Pembrook, engaged him to return; and Sir Walter was resolv'd, though inevitable Danger threatened him, to keep his Promise.

No sooner had they arrived upon the Coasts of Ireland, but the Taking and Sacking of Saint Thome, firing of the Town, and putting the Spaniards there to the Sword (though in their own defence) was noised abroad in all parts, and was by special Advertisement come unto the knowledge of Count de Gondamor: Who thereupon desiring Audience of his Majesty, said he had but one word to say: His Majesty much wondring what might be delivered in one word; when he came before him, he only bawl'd out, Pyrates, Pyrates, Pyrates. A very pretty short Speech for an Ambassadour. Whereupon his Majesty published his Royal Proclamation, for the discovery of the Truth of Sir Walter Raleigh's Proceedings, and the Advancement of Justice. But after all this Noise, Sir Walter is not question'd for his Guiana Action. For it is believed, not without very good Ground, that neither the transgression of his Commission, nor any thing acted beyond the Line, where the Articles of Peace between the two Crowns did not extend, could have in a legal course of Tryal shortned his days.

When Sir Walter was arrived at Plymouth, Sir Lewis Steukly, Vice-Admiral of the County of Devon, seiz'd him, being Commissioned by his Majesty to bring him to London; which could add no Terrour to a Person who could expect nothing less; and was now forc'd to make use of all the Arts imaginable to appease his Majesty, and defer his Anger. To which intent, Manowry, a French Quack at Salisbury, gave him several Vomits, and an Artificial Composition, which made him look gaſtly and dreadful, full of Pimples and Bliſters, and put the Cheat upon the very Phyſicians themſelves, who could not tell what to make of his Urine (though often inſpected) being adulterated with a Drug in the Glaſs, that turn'd it even in their very hands, into an earthy humour of a blackiſh colour, and of a very offenſive ſavour.

While he lay under this Politick diſguiſe, he penn'd his Declaration and Apology, which have ſufficiently proved his honourable Deſigns in that Voyage, and anſwered the little Calumnies of his Enemies. When he was brought to London, he was permitted the Confinement of his own Houſe: But finding the Court wholly guided by Gondamor, he could hope for little Mercy; therefore he wiſely contriv'd the deſign of an Eſcape into France, which Sir Lewis Steuckley betrayed. But the fate of Traytors purſued him, and brought him to a Contemptible End, to dye a poor diſtracted Begger in the Iſle of Lindey, having for a Bag of Money falſified his Faith, confirmed by the tye of the holy Sacrament, (if we may give credit to Mr. Howel, who hath given us this Story;) as alſo before the Year came about, to be found clipping the ſame very Coyn in the King's own Houſe at White-Hall, which he had received for a Reward of his Perfidiouſneſs: for which, being condemn'd to be hang'd, he was forc'd to ſell himſelf to his Shirt, to purchaſe his Pardon of two Knights.

King James was willing to ſacrifice the Life of Sir Walter to the Advancement of Peace with Spain, but not upon ſuch Grounds as the Ambaſſadour had deſign'd: for he deſir'd a Judgment upon the pretended Breach of Peace, that by this Occaſion he might ſlily gain from the Engliſh an acknowledgment of his Maſter's Right in thoſe Places, and hereafter both ſtop their Mouths, and quench their Heat and Valour. Hence upon his old Condemnation (for having had experience upon a former Tryal, they cared not to run the hazard of a ſecond) he was ſentenced: The old Judgment being only Averred againſt him; and from Weſtminſter-Hall he was carried to the Gate-Houſe; and from thence the next Morning to the Parliament-Yard, where he had the Favour of the Ax granted him. But all Perſons have wondred how that old Sentence, that had laid dormant ſixteen Years and upwards againſt Sir Walter, could have been made uſe of to take off his Head afterwards: Conſidering the then Lord Chancellor Vernlam told him poſitively, (as Sir Walter was acquainting him with that Proffer of Sir William St. Geon for a Pecuniary Pardon, which might have been obtained for a leſs Sum, than his Guiana Preparations amounted to) in theſe words: 'Sir, the Knee Timber 'of your Voyage is Money; ſpare your 'Purſe in this particular, for upon my 'Life you have a ſufficient Pardon for 'all that is paſſed already, the King ha-'ving under his Broad Seal made you 'Admiral of your Fleet, and given you 'Power of the Martial Law over the 'Officers and Souldiers. It was the O-pinion of moſt Lawyers, that he, who by his Majeſties Patent, had Power of Life and Death over the King's Liege People, ſhould be eſteemed or judged Rectus in Curia, and free from all old Convictions. But Sir Walter hath made the beſt Defence for his Guiana Actions, in his Letter to his Majeſty, which I have here inſerted.

May it pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſty.

'IF in my Journey outward bound, 'I had my Men Murdered at the 'Iſland, and yet ſpared to take Revenge. 'If I did diſcharge ſome Spaniſh Barques 'taken, without ſpoil. If I did for-'bear all parts of the Spaniſh Indies, 'wherein I might have taken twenty 'of their Towns on the Sea Coaſt, and 'did only follow the Enterpriſe I un-'dertook for Guiana, where without 'any Directions from me a Spaniſh 'Village was burnt, which was new 'ſet up within three miles of the Mine; 'by your Majeſtie's favour, I find no 'Reaſon why the Spaniſh Ambaſſador 'ſhould complain of me. If it were 'lawful for the Spaniards to Murder '26 Engliſhmen, binding them back to 'back, and then cutting their Throats, 'when they had traded with them a 'whole Month, and came to them on 'the Land without ſo much as one 'Sword; and that it may not be lawful 'for your Majeſties Subjects, being char-'ged firſt by them, to repel Force by 'Force; we may juſtly ſay, O mi-'ſerable Engliſh! If Parker and Me-'tham took Campeach and other places in 'the Honduraes, ſeated in the heart of 'the Spaniſh Indies, burnt Towns, kil-'led the Spaniards, and had nothing ſaid 'to them at their Return, and my ſelf 'forbore to look into the Indies becauſe

'I would

'I would not offend; I may justly say, 'O miserable Sir Walter Raleigh! If I 'spent my poor Estate, lost my Son, 'suffered by Sickness, and otherwise 'a World of Miseries; if I have resi- 'sted with the manifest hazard of my 'Life, the Robberies and Spoils which 'my Company would have made; if 'when I was Poor, I might have 'made my self Rich; if when I had 'gotten my Liberty, which all Men, 'and Nature it self do so much prise, 'I voluntarily lost it; if when I was 'sure of my Life, I rendred it again; 'if I might elsewhere have sold my 'Ship and Goods, and put 5 or 6000 'Pound in my Pocket, and yet have 'brought her into England. I beseech 'your Majesty to believe, that all this 'I have done, because it should not be 'said to your Majesty, that your Ma- 'jesty had given Liberty and Trust to 'a Man whose End was but the Re- 'covery of his Liberty, and who had 'betrayed your Majestie's Trust. My 'Mutineers told me, that if I return- 'ned for England, I should be undone; 'but I believed in your Majestie's Good- 'ness more than in all their Arguments. 'Sure I am, that I am the first that 'being free, and able to enrich my self, 'have imbraced Poverty and Peril: 'And as sure I am, that my Example 'shall make me the last. But your Ma- 'jestie's Wisdom and Goodness I have 'made my Judges who have ever been, 'and shall ever be,

Your Majestie's most humble Vassal,

WALTER RALEIGH.

But this Apology, though never so perswasive, could not satisfie Gondamor's Rage, who was resolv'd to sacrifice the only Favorite left of Queen Elizabeth, to the Spanish interest: And who, as Osborn remarks, was the only Person of Essex's Enemies that died lamented; and the only Man of Note left alive, that had help'd to beat the Spaniard in the Year 1588.

Upon Thursday the 29th of October 1618. Sir Walter Raleigh was conveyed by the Sheriffs of London to a Scaffold in the Old Palace at Westminster, where he was executed about nine of the Clock in the Morning of the same Day, whose Confession and several Speeches there delivered, with his Gesture and Behaviour, were as follows.

His first appearance upon the Scaffold, was with a smiling Countenance, saluting the Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen, with others of his Acquaintance there present; when after a Proclamation of Silence by an Officer appointed, he addressed himself to speak in this manner.

I desire to be born withal, because this is the third Day of my Feavour: And if I shew any weakness, I beseech you attribute it to my Malady, for this is the hour I look for it.

Then pawsing a while, directing himself towards a Window, where the Lord of Arundel, and the Lord of Doncaster, with some other Lords and Knights sate, with a loud Voice he said as followeth:

'I thank God of his infinite Good- 'ness that he hath sent me to dye in 'the sight of so Honourable an Assem- 'bly, and not in Darkness. But by rea- son the place where they sat was some distance from the Scaffold, that they could not easily hear him, he said, I will strain my self, for I would willingly have your Honours hear me. The Lord of Arundel answered, We will come upon the Scaffold; where after he had saluted every one of them severally, he began as follows:

'As I said, I thank my God hearti- 'ly that he hath brought me into the 'light to dye, and not suffered me to dye 'in the dark Prison of the Tower, where 'I have suffered a great deal of Adver- 'sity, and a long Sickness; and I thank 'God that my Feavour hath not taken 'me at this time, as I prayed God it 'might not.

'There are two main Points of Suspi- 'tion that his Majesty hath conceived a- 'gainst me, wherein his Majesty cannot 'be satisfied, which I desire to clear and 'resolve you in:

'One is, That his Majesty hath been 'informed that I have had some Plot 'with France, and his Majesty had some 'Reason to induce him thereunto. One 'Reason that his Majesty had to con- 'jecture so, was, That when I came 'back from Guiana, being come to Ply- 'mouth, I endeavoured to go to Rochel; 'which was because I would fain have 'made

'made my Peace before I came to England. Another Reason was, That upon my Flight I did intend to fly to France for saving of my Life, having had some terror from above. A third Reason was, The French Agent's coming to me; and it was reported I had Commission from the King of France.

'But this I say, for a Man to call God to witness to a Falshood at any time is a grievous sin, and what shall he hope for at the Tribunal Day of Judgment? But to call God to witness to a Falshood at the time of Death, is far more grievous and impious, and there is no hope for such an one. And what should I expect that am now going to render an Account of my Faith? I do therefore call the Lord to witness, as I hope to be saved, and as I hope to see him in his Kingdom, which will be within this quarter of this hour, I never had any Commission from the King of France, nor any Treaty with the French Agent, nor with any from the French King; neither knew I that there was an Agent, or what he was, till I met him in my Gallery at my Lodging unlook'd for. If I speak not true, O Lord, let me never come into thy Kingdom.

'The second Suspition was, That his Majesty hath been informed, That I should speak dishonourably and disloyally of him. But my Accuser was a base Frenchman, a kind of a Chymical Fellow, one whom I knew to be Perfidious; for being drawn into this Action at Winchester, in which my Hand was toucht, and he being sworn to secrecy over Night, reveal'd it in the Morning.

'But in this I speak now, What have I to do with Kings? I have nothing to do with them, neither do I fear them: I have now to do with God, therefore to tell a Lye now to get the Favour of the King were in vain. Therefore, as I hope to be saved at the last Day, I never spake dishonourably, disloyally, nor dishonestly of the King; neither to this Frenchman, nor to any other; neither had I ever in all my Life a thought of ill of his Majesty. Therefore I cannot but think it strange, that this Frenchman being so base, so mean a Fellow, should be so far credited; and so much for this Point. I have dealt truly, and I hope I shall be believed. I confess, I did attempt to escape, and I did dissemble and fain my self Sick at Salisbury, but I hope it was no sin. The Prophet David did make himself a Fool, and did suffer Spittle to fall upon his Beard, to escape the hands of his Enemies, and it was not imputed to him as sin; and I did it to prolong Time till his Majesty came, hoping for some Commiseration from him.

'I forgive this Frenchman, and Sir Lewis Steuckly, and have received the Sacrament this Morning of Mr. Dean, and I do also forgive all the World. But thus much I am bound in Charity to speak of this Man, that all Men may take good heed of him: Sir Lewis Steuckley, my Kinsman and Keeper, hath affirmed that I should tell him, that I did tell my Lord Carew, and my Lord Doncaster of my present Escape; but I protest before God, I never told Steuckly any such thing, neither did I tell my Lord Carew, or my Lord Doncaster, of my pretended Escape. It was not likely that I should acquaint two Privy-Counsellors of my purpose, neither would I tell him, for he left me six, seven, eight, nine or ten days to go where I listed, while he rode about the Country.

'Again, he accused me, that I should tell him, That my Lord Carew, and my Lord Doncaster would meet me in France: which was never my speech or thought.

'Thirdly, He accused me, That I shew'd him a Letter, and that I should give him 10000 l. for my Escape: but cast my Soul into everlasting Fire if ever I made him offer of 10000 l. or 1000 l. but meerly I shew'd him a Letter, that if he would go with me, his Debts should be paid when he was gone; neither had I 1000 l. for if I had had so much, I could have done better with it, and made my Peace otherwise.

'Fourthly, When I came to Sir Edward Pelham, who had been sometimes a follower of mine, who gave me good Entertainment; he gave out that I had receve'd some dram of Poyson in Sir Edward Pelham's House: when I answered, that I feared no such thing; for I was well assured of them in the House. Now God forgive him, for I do, and desire God to forgive him: I will not only say God is the God of Revenge, but I desire God to forgive him, as I hope to be forgiven.

Then

Then he looked over his Note of Remembrance; 'Well (ſaith he) thus far I 'have gone; now a little more, and I will 'have done by and by.

'It was told the King I was brought 'per force into England, and that I did 'not intend to come again: Whereas 'Captain Charles Parker, Mr. Treſham, 'Mr. Leak, and divers others that knew 'how I was dealt withal, ſhall witneſs 'for me: For the Common Souldiers '(which were 150) mutined, and ſent 'for me to come into the Gun-Room 'to them, (for at that time they would 'not come to me) and there was I forc'd 'to take an Oath, that I would not come 'into England till they would have me, 'elſe they would caſt me into the Sea 'and drown me; afterwards they entred 'my Cabin and ſet themſelves againſt me. 'After I had taken this Oath, with Wine 'and other things I drew the chiefeſt of 'them to deſiſt, and at length perſwaded 'them to go into Ireland: Then would 'they have gone into the North parts of 'Ireland, but I told them they were Red-ſhanks: yet at laſt with much ado I perſwaded them to go into the South parts; 'promiſing to get their Pardons: but was 'forc'd to give them 125 l. at Kingſale to 'bring them home, otherwiſe I had never 'got from them.

'There was a Report that I meant 'not to go to Guiana at all; and that 'I knew not of any Mine, nor intended 'any ſuch matter, but only to get my 'Liberty, which I had not the wit to 'keep. But it was my full intent to 'go for Gold, for the benefit of his 'Majeſty, and thoſe that went with me, 'with the reſt of my Countrymen: But 'he that knew the Head of the Mine, 'would not diſcover it when he ſaw my 'Son was ſlain, but made himſelf away. 'Then he turned to my Lord of Arundel and ſaid, Being in the Gallery in 'my Ship at my Departure, Your Honour took me by the hand, and ſaid 'you would requeſt me one thing, that 'was, That whether I made a good Voyage 'or bad, yet I ſhould return again into England; when I made you a Promiſe, and 'gave you my Faith that I would: And 'ſo you did (anſwered my Lord) it is 'true, they were the laſt words I ſpake unto you.

'Another Opinion was that I carried 'to Sea with me 1600 Pieces, and that 'was all the Voyage I intended, only to 'get Money into my Hands, and that 'I had weighed my Voyage before: 'whereas I proteſt I had but 100 Pound 'in all the World, whereof I gave 25 'Pounds to my Wife: The Reaſon of 'this Speech was this; there was entered '20000 Pound, and yet but 4000 Pound 'in the Surveyors Book; now I gave 'my Bill for the other 16000 Pound for 'divers Adventurers, but I proteſt I had 'not a Penny of Money more than 100 'Pound, as I hope to be ſaved.

'Another Slander was raiſed, that I 'would have gone away from them and 'left them at Guiana, but there were a 'great many of worthy Men that accompanied me always, as my Serjeant Major 'George Raleigh, and divers others (which 'he then named) that knew my Intent 'was nothing ſo. And theſe be the Material Points I thought good to ſpeak of; 'I am now at this inſtant to render my 'Account to God, and I proteſt as I ſhall 'appear before Him, this that I have ſpoken 'is true.

'I will ſpeak but a word or two more, be'cauſe I will not trouble Mr. Sheriff too long.

'There was a Report ſpread, that I 'ſhould rejoyce at the Death of my Lord 'of Eſſex, and that I ſhould take Tobac'co in his preſence; when as I proteſt I 'ſhed Tears at his Death, though I was 'one of the contrary Faction; and at the 'time of his Death I was all the while in 'the Armory at the further end, where 'I could but ſee him; I was ſorry that I 'was not with him, for I heard he had 'a deſire to ſee me, and be reconciled to 'me. So that I proteſt I lamented his Death, 'and good cauſe had I, for it was the worſe 'for me as it proved, for after he was gone 'I was little beloved.

'And now I intreat you all to joyn 'with me in Prayer, that the great God 'of Heaven, whom I have grievouſly of'fended, being a Man full of all Vanity, 'and have lived a ſinful Life, in all ſin'ful Callings, having been a Souldier, a 'Captain, a Sea-Captain, and a Courtier, 'which are all places of Wickedneſs and 'Vice; that God (I ſay) would for'give me, and caſt away my Sins from 'me, and that he would receive me into 'everlaſting Life. So I take my leave 'of you all, making my Peace with God.

Then Proclamation being made that all Men ſhould depart the Scaffold, he prepared himſelf for Death, giving away his Hat and wrought Night-Cap, and ſome Money to ſuch as he knew that ſtood near him: Taking his leave of the Lords, Knights, and other Gentlemen, and and among the reſt taking his leave of the Lord of Arundel, he thanked him for his Company, and intreated him to deſire the King, that no ſcandalous Writing to defame him might be publiſhed after his Death; ſaying further unto him, I have a long Journey to go, and therefore I will take my leave.

Then putting off his Gown and Doublet, he called to the Headſman to ſhew him the Ax, which being not preſently ſhewed him, he ſaid, I pray thee let me ſee it, Doſt thou think that I am afraid of it? And having it in his hands, he felt along upon the Edge of it, and ſmiling ſpake to the Sheriff, ſaying, This is a ſharp Medicine, but it is a Phyſician for all Diſeaſes. Then going to and fro upon the Scaffold, on every ſide he prayed the Company to pray to God to aſſiſt him and ſtrengthen him.

And ſo being asked which way he would lay himſelf, on which ſide the Block, as he ſtretched himſelf along and laid his Head on the Block, he ſaid, So the Heart be right, it is no matter which way the Head lieth. And then praying, after he had forgiven the Headſman, having given him a Sign when he ſhould do his Office, at two blows he loſt both Head and Life, his Body never ſhrinking nor moving. His Head was ſhewed on each ſide of the Scaffold, and then put into a Red-Leather Bag, and his wrought Velvet Gown thrown over it, which was afterwards conveyed away in a Mourning Coach of his Ladies.

The large effuſion of Blood which proceeded from his Veins, amaz'd the Spectators, who conjectur'd he had ſtock enough left of Nature to have ſurvived many years, though now near fourſcore years old.

He behav'd himſelf at his Death with ſo High and ſo Religious a Reſolution, as if a Chriſtian had acted a Roman, or rather a Roman a Chriſtian: And by the Magnanimity which was then conſpicuous in him, he abundantly baffled their Calumnies who had accus'd him of Atheiſm.

Various were the Reſentments of his Death, and ſeveral Paſquils (as it always happens on ſuch Occaſions) were ſcatter'd abroad.

Of the Gallantry of his Behaviour on the Scaffold, theſe following Verſes may give a Confirmation, and a Taſte of the Poetry of thoſe Times.

Upon Sir Walter Raleigh's Execution and Death.

Great Heart! who taught thee ſo to die?
Death yielding thee the Victory.
Where took'ſt thou leave of Life? If here,
How could'ſt thou be ſo far from Fear?
But ſure thou dyed'ſt, and quit'dſt the ſtate
Of Fleſh and Blood, before that Fate.
Elſe what a Miracle were wrought,
To triumph both in Fleſh and Thought.
I ſaw in every Stander by Pale Death, Life only in thy Eye.
Farewel; Truth ſhall this Story ſay,
We dy'd, Thou only liv'dſt that Day.

Or if the Reader pleaſes, he may take this following Elegy, compoſed on the ſame Subject, by a Sacred Wit of thoſe times.

An Elegy on Sir W. R.

I will not weep: for 'twere as great a ſin
To ſhed a Tear for Thee, as to have been An Actor in thy Death. Thy Life and Age
Was but a various Scene on Fortunes Stage;
With whom thou tugg'ſt and ſtrov'ſt, (even out of breath,
In thy long Toyl, ne're maſter'd till thy Death;
And then, deſpight of Trains, and cruel Wit,
Thou didſt at once ſubdue Malice, and it.
I dare not then ſo blaſt thy Memory,
As t' ſay I do lament or pity Thee.
Were I to chooſe a Subject to beſtow
My Pity on, he ſhould be one as low
In Spirit as Deſert: That durſt not dye,
But rather were content by Slavery
To purchaſe Life: Or would I pity thoſe
Thy moſt induſtrious and friendly Foes,
Who when they thought to make Thee Scandals ſtory,
Lent Thee a ſwifter Flight to Heav'n and Glory.
They thought by cutting off ſome wither'd Days
(Which thou could'ſt ſpare them) to eclipſe thy Praiſe;
Yet gave it brighter Foil, made thy ag'd Fame
Appear more White and Fair, than Foul their Shame.
And did promote an Execution,
Which, but for them, Nature and Age had done.
Such worthleſs things as theſe are only born
To live on Pities Alms (too mean for Scorn.)
Thou dy'dſt an envious Wonder, whoſe high Fate
The World muſt ſtill admire, ſcarce imitate.

Thus

Thus died that Knight, who was Spain's Scourge and Terror, and Gondamor's Triumph, whom the whole Nation pitied, and ſeveral Princes interceded for; Queen Elizabeth's Favourite, and her Succeſſors Sacrifice. A Perſon of ſo much Worth and ſo great Intereſt, that King James would not execute him without an Apology. One of ſuch incomparable Policy, that he was too hard for Eſſex, was the Envy of Leiceſter, and Cecil's Rival; who grew jealous of his Excellent Parts, and was afraid of being ſupplanted by him. THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD:

Intreating of the Beginning and First Ages of the same, from the CREATION unto ABRAHAM.

The FIRST BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the Creation, and Preservation of the World.

§. I.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wisest men acknowledg to be a Power uneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant clarity invisible; an Understanding which it self can onely comprehend; an Essence eternal and spiritual, of absolute pureness and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the Work of the World: in the wonderful magnitude whereof (all which he embraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that glory which cannot be measured, and withal, that one, and yet universal Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven, we perceive a shadow of his Divine Countenance; in his merciful provision for all that live, his manifold goodness: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World universal, by the absolute Art of his own Word, his Power and Almightiness; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdom, and Goodness, being all but Attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of Celestial and Terrestrial bodies: Terrestrial, in their strange and manifold diversities; Celestial, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continual and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledg of the omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Maker.

In these more than wonderful works, God (saith * Hugo) speaketh unto man: and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, those that live, witness in themselves; the sensible in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable souls: for, according to * S. Gregory, Omnis homo eo ipso quòd rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet; Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Job) which is, according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conspicere in creaturis, To discern him in autem manifestans, per omnia apparet, & in omnibus. Apparentia rerum est, nihil apparitio quàm generatio.

* Hugo sic per Eccles. Homil. 8.

* Greg. in Mor. Herm. ad. fil. Tat. l. 5.

Vnus verò ingenitus, & non apparens & immanifestus, omnia solùm gen-his Providence by his creatures. That God hath been otherwise seen, to wit, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding, grounded on these places of S. John and S. Paul, Ye have not heard his voice at any time, neither have ye seen his shape. And again, Whom never man saw, nor can see.

Joh. 5. 3. 1 Tim. 6. 16.

And this I am sure agrees with the nature of God's simplicity, of which S. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostom, Gregory, Nazianzene, Hierom, Augustine, Gregory the great, Evaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of Authority. But by his own Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men; which is also the understood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphical Characters are the unnumbred Stars, the Sun and Moon; written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those living Creatures, and Plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Cusanus, Mundus universus nihil aliud est, quàm Deus explicatus; The World universal is nothing else but God expresst. And the invisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seen by the creation of the World, being considered in his Creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding than his own Will, no other matter than his own Power, no other Workman than his own Word, no other consideration than his own infinite goodness. The example and pattern of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of his own love, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchanged Will moved, by his high Wisdom disposed, and by his Almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to love God, ex fide, & ex effectibus (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds Creation: Neque enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognosciq; potest, sed vel ex rerum, quæ factæ sunt, quæque fiunt & gubernantur, observatione & collatione; vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be known by any knowledge of cause or beginning (saith Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and govern; or else by the word of God himself.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

THis work and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by divers terms, and in a different manner expresst; I mean all those who are intitled by S. Augustine, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest judgment and understanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium universorum, The original of the Universal; to whom he giveth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Actus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein he truely with S. Paul, casteth upon God all power; confessing also, that the World was made by Gods Almighty Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus, fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) took the word Fire to express God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in S. Paul it is used) Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt, All things (saith he) are caused or produced out of one fire.

Herm. in Pœmandro, & in sermone sacro.

Deut. 4. 24. Heb. 12. 19.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the World had beginning in time, from the will of the most high God; whose remarkable words are thus converted; Cum abscondisset omnia Jupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceive this sence: When great Jupiter had hidden all things in himself, working out of the love of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth, into grateful light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Unus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. Plato calleth God the cause and original, the nature and reason of the universal; Totus rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter. Vid. cap. 6.

Now, although the curiosity of some men have found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers in matters of Divinity: (it being true, that the Scripture hath not want of any forrain testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so S. Paul himself did not despise, but thought it lawful and profitable, to remember whatsoever he found agreeable to the word of God among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendring vengeance to them that know him not, as in the Epistle to Titus he citeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menander; and in the seventeenth of the Acts, Aratus &c. For, Truth (saith S. Ambrose) by whomsoever uttered, is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocunque dicatur, à Spiritu sancto est: and lastly, let those kind of men learn this rule; Quæ sacris serviunt, prophana non sunt; Nothing is prophane, that serveth to the use of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes. 1. 1.

THis visible World of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrews seek some hidden mystery, and which in the Jews Targum is converted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men have conceived, both which are subsequent: but only to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primary Matter to be informed, nor Form to inform, nor any Being, but the Eternal. Nature was not, nor the next Parent or Time, begotten, Time properly and naturally taken: for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being; then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater power, than that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an One (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, than to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we feign double creation, or allow of two Powers, and both infinite; the impossibility whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile est plura esse infinita: quoniam alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot be more Infinities than one: for one of them would limit the other.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth, Geneſ. 2. 1.

THe Univerſal matter of the World (which Moſes comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diverſly underſtood; for there are that conceive, that by thoſe words was meant the firſt matter, as the Peripateticks underſtand it; to which S. Auguſtine and Iſidore ſeem to adhere, Feciſti mundum (ſaith S. Auguſtine) de materia informi; quam feciſti de nulla re, pene nullam rem: that is, Thou haſt made the World of a matter without form; which matter thou madeſt of nothing, and being made, it was little other than nothing.

But this potential and imaginary materia prima, cannot exiſt without form. Peter Lombard, the Schoolmen, Beda, Lyranus, Comeſtor, Toſtatus, and others affirm, that it pleaſed God firſt of all to create the Empyrean Heaven: which at the ſucceeding inſtant (ſaith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heaven Steuchius Eugubinus calleth Divine clarity and uncreated: an Errour, for which he is ſharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the ſubſequent, when he made it to be a place, and the ſeat of Angels, and juſt Souls, than in the former affirmation; for of the firſt, That God liveth in eternal Light, it is written, My Soul, praiſe thou the Lord, that covereth himſelf with light: and in the Revelation, And the City hath no need of the Sun, neither of the Moon to ſhine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein alſo John Mercer upon Geneſis differeth not in opinion from Eugubynus: for as by Heaven created in the beginning, was not meant the inviſible or ſuperceleſtial; ſo in his judgment, becauſe it was in all eternity the glorious Seat of God himſelf, it was not neceſſary to be created; Quem mundum Supercæleſtem meo judicio creari (ſaith Mercer) non erat neceſſe.

Pſ. 104. 12. Claritas divina non eſt lux facta, ſed ſapientia Dei, non creata, ſed nata, Apoc. 21. 23. Mercer. in Gen. 7. 7.

But as Moſes forbare to ſpeak of Angels, and of things inviſible and incorporate, for the weakneſs of their capacities, whom he then cared to inform of thoſe things which were moſt manifeſt, (to wit) that God did not only by a ſtrong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promiſe made to their fore-fathers; but alſo that he created, and was the ſole cauſe of this aſpectable, and perceiveable Univerſal: ſo on the other ſide I dare not think, that any ſuperceleſtial Heaven, or whatſoever elſe (not himſelf) was increate and eternal; and as for the place of God before the World created, the finite wiſdom of mortal men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the Seat of Infinite Power, no more than Infinite Power can be limited: for his place is in Himſelf, whom no magnitude elſe can contain: How great is the houſe of God (ſaith Baruch) how large is the place of his poſſeſſion! it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeaſurable.

Bar. 3. 24, 25.

But leaving multiplicity of opinions, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the ſolid matter and ſubſtance, as well of all the Heavens, and Orbs ſupernal, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it over, (to wit) that very matter of all things, Materia, Chaos, poſſibilitas, ſive poſſe fieri. Which matter (ſaith Calvin) was ſo called, Quod totius mundi ſemen fuerit; Becauſe it was the ſeed of the Univerſal: an Opinion of Ancient Philoſophers long before.

§. V.

That the ſubſtance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moſes underſtood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the Attributes of unformed and void, is deſcribed as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

Moſes firſt nameth Heaven and Earth (putting Waters but in the third place) as comprehending Waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to diſtinguiſh the confuſed Maſs, and (as Baſil ſaith) Præparare naturam aquæ ad fœcunditatem vitalem; To prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulneſs.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures expreſt: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatſoever is under the Moon, and ſubject to alteration. Corrupt ſeeds bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heavens are not ſubject, though ſubject to periſhing. They ſhall periſh (ſaith David) and the heavens ſhall vaniſh away like ſmoak, ſaith Eſay. Neither were the Waters the matter of Earth; for it is written, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear: which proveth, that the dry Land was mixt and covered with the Waters, and not yet diſtinguiſhed; but no way, that the Waters were the Matter or Seed of the Earth, much leſs of the Univerſal. Initio tu, Domine, terram fundâſti; Thou, O Lord, in the beginning haſt founded the Earth: And again, The Earth was covered with the Deep (meaning with Waters) as with a garment, ſaith David. And if by natural arguments it may be proved, That Water by condenſation may become Earth, the ſame Reaſon teacheth us alſo, that Earth rarified may become Water: Water, Air: Air, Fire: and ſo on the contrary. Deus ignis ſubſtantiam per aërem in aquam convertit; God turneth the ſubſtance of Fire by Air into Water. For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the ſame ſtate, in which they were created, as touching their ſubſtance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in reſpect of beauty and ornament. Cœlum verò & terra in ſtatu creationis remanſerunt quantum ad ſubſtantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis poſtmodum ſuperaddita eſt. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be underſtood according to the Latine Tranſlation ſimply, and as ſpecifical water; but the ſame more properly ſignifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Eſt autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero Aquas fecit; For Maim (ſaith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of divers natures) and this name or word the Latines, wanting a voice to expreſs it, call it in the Plural, Aquas, Waters.

This Maſs, or indigeſted Matter, or Chaos, created in the beginning, was without Form, that is, without the proper Form, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had ſeparated the Earth, and digeſted it from the Waters. And the Earth was void, that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any Plants, Fruits, or Flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigeſted Matter into that form, which it now retaineth; then did the Earth bud forth the Herb, which ſeedeth ſeed, and the fruitful Tree according to his kind, and God ſaw that it was good; which Attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confuſed; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God ſaw that it was good, that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Ex perfecti Dei perfecta ſunt opera; The Works of the perfect God, are perfect.

§. VI.

How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the waters; and that this is not to be searched curiously.

After the Creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without form, the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters. The Seventy Interpreters use the word superferebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat or fovebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cujusdam Syri sententiam recensebo (saith Basil:) which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a special likeness. Verbum translatum est ab avibus pullitiei suæ incubantibus, quamvis spirituali, & planè inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner.

Basil Hexam.

Junius.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: The Chaldean Paraphrast in this sence, Ventus à conspectu Dei sufflabat: or, as other understand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the 147. Psalm, He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elohim Meracheset, id est, efficaciter motitans, confovens, ac agitans super facies geminî liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cherishing, quickning and stirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh four originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and material, to wit, Causa, which is the Divine Goodness: Jehi, which is, fiat, sive erit, Let it be, or, It shall be. Quæ vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the Word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohim, The Spirit of God, id est, Vis quædam divina, agilis ac præsens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens; that is, A certain divine power, or strength, every where active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, Materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my self, I am resolved, (Cum Deus sit super rationale omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderful waies of working, may in a measure be perceived by man's understanding, yet the manner and first operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortal body. Animalis homo quæ Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esay) are not your thoughts, neither are your waies my waies. And as the World hath not known God himself, so are his waies (according to S. Paul) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality, and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely known to God. Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Ubiquity) is in all things, either by Essence, Presence, or Power, our understanding cannot comprehend. Nihil interest Deum hominemque distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius Majestatis æternæ, cogitatio assequeretur humana; There would be no difference between God and man, if man's understanding could conceive the counsels and disposing of that Eternal Majesty; and therefore to be over-curious in searching how the all-powerful Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gave form to the Matter of the Universal, is a labour and search like unto his, who not contented with a known and safe Foord, will presume to pass over the greatest Rivers in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his understanding. We behold the Sun, and enjoy his light, as long as we look towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: We warm our selves safely, while we stand near the fire; but if we seek to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

Lact. in Præfat.

But to eschew curiosity: this is true, that the English word (moved) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this Omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with Mirandula, Vis causæ efficientis, The force of the efficient cause; S. Augustine sometimes taketh for the Holy Ghost; sometimes for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, under the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: Anaxagoras, Mentem: Tostatus, Voluntatem & mentem Dei, The will and mind of God; which Mens, Plato in Timæo maketh Animam mundi, The soul of the World: and in his sixth Book de Republica, he calleth it, The Law of Heaven; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & non mea tantùm, sed etiam Angelorum; My mind faileth, my voice is silent, and not mine onely, but even the voice of Angels: so may all men else say in the understanding and utterance of the waies and works of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed consubstantiale illi est, quicquid ejus est, & quicquid est; Whatsoever Attribute of him there is, and whatsoever he is, it is the very same substance that himself is.

Nazian. lib. 2. Theol.

But the Spirit of God which moved upon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustaineth and giveth continuance to the Universal. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith Solomon. If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith David) they are created: And Gregory, Deus suo præsentiali esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum defluerunt universa; God giveth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himself from them, then as of nothing the World was made, it would again fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath expresst excellently:

Sapi. 1. v. 7.

All this great Body of the Universe.

And this was the same Spirit, which moved in the Universal, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heavens, saith Job. So then the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and created in them their spirituality, and natural motion; motion brought forth heat; and heat rarifaction, and subtilty of parts. By this Spirit (which gave heat and motion, and thereby, operation to every nature, while it moved upon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all forms alike) was begotten Aire: an Element superiour, as lighter than the Waters; through whose vast, open, subtile, Diaphanick, or transparent body, the light, afterwards created, might easily transpierce: Light for the excellency thereof being the first Creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostom calleth a vital Operation, Aquis à Deo insitam, ex qua aquæ non solum motionem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vital Operation given by God unto the Waters, whereby the Waters had not only motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth living Creatures.

Gen. 1. 5.

§. VII.

Of the Light created, as the material substance of the Sun, and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

THese Waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the Sun, the Organ and Instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceive) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sun's creation, and the uniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proved by these words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which Lights in the Firmament of Heaven, were also made for signs, and for seasons, and for daies, and for years, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, daies and years are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three days which preceded the Sun's creation, or formal perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the Day named in the fifth Verse; was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sun's motion made a civil or natural day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the Firmament, and of the lower and upper Waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures therein; Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Man's body: so may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or material substance of the Sun, and other Lights of Heaven: Howbeit, neither the Sun, nor any thing sensible, is that light it self, Quæ causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are lightsome (though it make it self and all things else visible:) but a body most illightned, which illuminateth the Moon, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Æther, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is effected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our ayr. For this light Avicenna calleth Vehiculum & fomentum omnium cœlestium virtutum, & impressionum: The conducter, and preserver, or nourisher of all Celestial virtues and impressions, nothing descending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Aristotle calleth light a quality, inherent or cleaving to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inhærens Diaphano: but this may be better avouched of the heat, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heat (say the Platonicks) Abeunte lumine residet in subjecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subject, as warmth in the ayr, though the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academicks make incorporal, and so doth Montanus, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium; Which neither hardness resisteth, nor space leaveth.

Lux dicitur, quæ se & omnia visibilia facit. Cusan. in Compend. cap. 7. & exercit. lib. 5.

Ficin. lib. lumine. cap. 11.

Aristotle findeth corporality in the beams of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Picolomineus. Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, give materiality to light it self, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant from the Heaven to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardness, because it passeth through the solid body of glass, or other Crystalline matter; and whereas it is withstood by unclean and unpure earthy substances, less hard, and more easie to invade than the former, the same is, Quòd obstaculum naturâ terreum atq; sordidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem; Because an obstacle by nature earthy and foul, doth not receive the pure clearness of light: alluding to that most Divine Light, which onely shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly dross, and humane uncleanness.

Plotin.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither do I marvel at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoolmen, or other antient or latter Writers, that any of them understood either it or themselves therein: all men (to cast off ignorance) have disputed thereof, but there is no man that hath been taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferiour to any in wit) as he hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his own judgment herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the School-men were rather curious in the nature of terms, and more subtile in distinguishing upon the parts of doctrine already laid down, than discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophy or Divinity: of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientiæ odiosius acumine nimio; Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, than too accute sharpness. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought forth and devoured) resolved us, whether this light be substantial, corporal, or incorporal: Corporal they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the ayr, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth; and yet every day we see the ayr illightned: Incorporal it cannot be, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed. Others say (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no form so excellent as it self to inform it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sun, the Sun is no more the Sun in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and form, then either, or both must be one of these, lucid or bright, dark or opake, Diaphanous or transparent; but darkness cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light nor darkness, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or form, or both, be lucid and shining. Lucid and shining obtain their so being of the light; and therefore if we derive this being of light from a former, then would the progress go on infinitely and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sun hath his being primarily, and immediately of it self, and is therefore the Sun's form, and the form of all lucid and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

Lucida corpora sunt plena sua, luce, alienis tenebris impervia. Opaca sunt plena suis tenebris alieno lumine. Transparentia (ut Diaphana carent suis & lumine & tenebris: alienis & lumine & tenebris permeantur. Scal. sub. ex. 71.

But in my understanding, Lumen (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentional Species cies of that, which may be Englished by Light; and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sun, or other lights of Heaven, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentional Species thereof; and an intentional Species may be understood by example of a red or green colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or green glass: for then we perceive the same colour cast upon any thing opposite; which redness or other colour, we call the intentional Species of the colour in that glass. And again, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet understood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, be the same which the Sun inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the Sun's creation.

But by the most wise and unchanged order, which God observed in the works of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the first day created, was the substance of the Sun: for Moses repeateth twice the main parts of the Universal: first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with form: first, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made dry Land; and the Heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or dry Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their virtual forms: So the Sun, although it had not its formal perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day united, and set in the Firmament of Heaven: for, to Light created in the first day God gave no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdome of God find cause why it should move (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by moving, the Sun might give Light, heat, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the Herb, &c. God caused the Sun to move, and (by interchange of time) to visit every part of the inferiour World; by his heat to stir up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that use and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerful Word he approved, and approving it, disposed thereof, to the use and comfort of his future Creatures.

Quemadmodum Rex aliquis, &c. Procop. in Gen. 1.

Job 38. 24. 9. But in that it pleased God to ask of Job, By what way is the Light parted, and where is the way where Light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under man's understanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by God's grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the Treasure of God (saith Esdras:) And those which inhabit the Heavens, do onely know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in cælo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknown in Heaven, nothing perfectly known on Earth. Res veræ sunt in mundo invisibili; in mundo visibili umbræ rerum: Things themselves are in the invisible World; in the world visible, but their shadows. Surely, if this Light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth neareſt unto spirituality; and if it have any corporality, then of all other the most subtile and pure; for howsoever, it is of all things seen, the most beautiful, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficial. For it ministreth unto men, and other creatures, all celestial influences; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrows, which the darkness both begetteth and maintaineth; it discovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up with an Angelical swiftness, our eyes unto Heaven, that by the light thereof, our minds being informed of his visible marvels, may continually travel to surmount these perceived Heavens, and to find out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it self in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cætera mundi membra digna sunt laudibus, cùm suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the Light (saith Saint Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it self communicateth its goodness and beauty unto all. Of which, Ovid out of Orpheus:

Lastly, If we may behold in any creature, any one spark of that eternal fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightness, the same in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this Light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa; and the Light, by Hermes, named Lux sancta; and Christ our Saviour said to be that Light which lightneth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimity, and purity, this is also true, that God is neither a mind, nor a Spirit of the nature of other Spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus profectò non mens est, at verò ut sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa quâ spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa quâ lumen existit: God (saith Hermes in Pœmandro) certainly is not a mind, but the cause that the mind hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the Mass and Chaos being first created, void, dark, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickned; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into Ayr, which God illightned: the Earth also by being contiguat, and mixt with waters (participating the same Divine virtue) brought forth the bud of the herb that seedeth seed, &c. And for a mean and organ, by which this operative virtue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those several species, which the Earth (being made fruitful by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times succeeding.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Chrystalline Heaven, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the middest of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarifaction and evaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But

But theſe waters ſeparate above this Extenſion, which the Latine Tranſlation calleth firmamentum, or expanſum (for ſo Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius turn it) are not the Cryſtalline Heavens created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Baſilius Magnus calleth a childiſh ſuppoſition, making in the ſame place many learned arguments againſt this fancie. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the Ayr above us, where the ſame is more ſolid and condenſe, which God ſeparated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended diſtance and vaſt ſpace: the words Raquia (which Montanus writeth Rakiagh) and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the Heaven and for Ayr, and more properly for the Ayr and Æther, than for the Heavens, as the beſt Hebricians underſtand them, Quo ſuprema ac tenuia ab infimis craſſis diducta, interſectaque diſtarent, for that whereby the ſupreme and thin bodies were placed in diſtance, being ſevered and cut off from low and groß matters: and the waters above the firmament, expreſt in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the Ayr, or in the uppermoſt Region of the ſame.

And that the word Heaven is uſed for the Air, the Scriptures every where witneſs; as in the bleſſings of Joſeph, and in the 104. Pſalm: * By theſe Springs ſhall the fowl of the Heaven dwell; and upon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimſtone and fire out of the Heaven; and in Iſaac's bleſſing to Jacob; God give thee therefore of the dew of Heaven: and in Deuteronomy the 11. But the land whither you go to poſſeſs it, is a land that drinketh water of the rain of Heaven: And in Job, Who hath ingrendred the froſts of Heaven? And in Saint Matthew, Behold the Fowls of Heaven, for they ſow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the Old Teſtament throughout, is the word Heaven very oft uſed for Air, and taken alſo hyperbolically for any great Height, as, Let us build us a Tower, whoſe top may reach to Heaven, &c. And in this very place Baſil avoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of ſimilitude: His own words be theſe; Et vocavit Deus firmamentum Cœlum? Hæc appellatio alii quidem propriè accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad ſimilitudinem; And God called the firmament Heaven: This appellation (ſaith Baſil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the Starry Heaven) but to this (that is, to the Firmament dividing the waters) it is impoſed by ſimilitude. And if there were no other proof, that by the Firmament was meant the Air, and not the Heaven; the words of Moſes in the eighth Verſe, conferred with the ſame word Firmament in the twentieth Verſe, make it manifeſt: For in the eighth Verſe it is written, that God called the Firmament, which divided waters from waters, Heaven; and in the twentieth Verſe he calleth the Firmament of Heaven, Air; In theſe words, And let the Fowl flye upon earth in the open firmament of Heaven. And what uſe there ſhould be of this Icie, or Cryſtalline, or watery Heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the Primum mobile would otherwiſe gather and increaſe: though in very truth, inſtead of this help, it would add an unmeaſurable greatneſs of Circle, whereby the ſwiftneſs of that firſt Moveable would exceed all poſſibility of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impoſſibilia; but no man ought to be held to impoſſibilities; and Faith it ſelf (which ſurmounteth the height of all humane reaſon) hath for a forcible conductor the Word of Truth, which alſo may be called Lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reaſon and underſtanding. Now that this ſuppoſed firſt Moveable, turneth it ſelf ſo many hundred thouſand Miles in an inſtant (ſeeing the Scriptures teach it not) let thoſe that can believe mens imagination, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of theſe many Heavens, let the Reader that deſireth ſatisfaction, ſearch Orontius; and of this watery Heaven, Baſilius Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40, 41, &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, in his ſecond Book and ſixth Chapter. For my ſelf, I am perſwaded, that the waters called, The waters above the Heavens; are but the Clouds and waters engendred in the uppermoſt Air.

A Concluſion, repeating the ſumm of the works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The Creation of matter, The Forming of it, The Finiſhing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the firſt Chapter of Geneſis, that this was the order of the moſt wiſe God in the beginning, and when there was no other Nature, or Being, but God's incomprehenſible Eternity. Firſt, he created the matter of all things: and in the firſt three dayes he diſtinguiſhed, and gave to every nature his proper form; the form of levity to that which aſcended; to that which deſcended, the form of gravity: for he ſeparated light from darkneſs, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the Firmament into one place. In the laſt three dayes, God adorned, beautified, and repleniſhed the World: he ſet in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sun, Moon, and Stars; filled the Earth with Beaſts, the Ayr with Fowl, and the Sea with Fiſh, giving to all that have life a power generative, thereby to continue their Species, and kinds; to Creatures vegetative and growing, their Seeds in themſelves; for he created all things, that they might have their being: and the generations of the world are preſerved.

Wiſd. Sal. c. 1. 14.

That Nature, is no Principium per ſe; nor Form, the giver of Being: and of our ignorance how ſecond cauſes ſhould have any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working-power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and reſt, according to Ariſtotle; the ſame is nothing elſe, but the ſtrength and faculty, which God hath infuſed into every Creature, having no other ſelf-ability, than a Clock, after it is wound up by a man's hand, hath. Thoſe therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any firſt or ſole power, have therein no other underſtanding, than ſuch a one hath, who looking into the Stern of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helm and Rudder, doth aſcribe ſome abſolute virtue to the piece of wood, without all conſideration of the hand that guides it, or of the judgment, which alſo directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in all elſe, that by the virtue of the firſt act, all Agents work whatſoever they work: Virtute primi actus, agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: For as the mind of man ſeeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the ears, and maketh choice by the will: and therefore we attribute ſight to the eye, and hearing to the ears, &c. and yet it is the mind only, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all theſe his Inſtruments and Organs; ſo God worketh by Angels, by the Sun, by the Stars, by Nature or infuſed properties, and by men as by ſeveral Organs, ſeveral effects; all ſecond cauſes whatſoever, being but inſtruments, conduits, and pipes, which carry and diſperſe what they have received from the head and fountain of the Univerſal. For as it is Gods infinite power, and every-where-preſence (compaſſing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the Sun power to draw up vapours, to be made clouds; clouds to contain rain, and rain to fall: ſo all ſecond and inſtrumental cauſes together with Nature ture it ſelf, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would become altogether ſilent, virtueleſs, and dead: of which excellently Orpheus; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee ſpring forth in youthful green. I enforce not theſe things, thereby to annihilate thoſe variable virtues which God hath given to his Creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all His works in their virtues praiſe him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philoſophers, and thoſe that follow them, have taken on them to teach: I ſay, there is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or expreſs it, ever enrich his own underſtanding with any certain truth, or ever edifie others (not fooliſh by ſelf-flattery) therein. For (ſaith Lactantius, ſpeaking of the wiſdom of the Philoſophers) Si facultas inveniendæ veritatis huic ſtudio ſubjaceret, aliquando eſſet inventa; cum verò tot temporibus, tot ingeniis in ejus inquiſitione contritis, non ſit comprehenſa, apparet nullam ibi eſſe ſapientiam; If in this ſtudy (ſaith he) were means to find out the truth, it had ere this bin found out: but ſeeing it is not yet comprehended, after that ſo much time, and ſo many wits have been worn out in the inquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wiſdom there to be had. Nam ſi de unâ re præciſa ſcientia haberetur, omnium rerum ſcientia neceſſariò haberetur: If the preciſe knowledg of any one thing were to be had, it ſhould neceſſarily follow, that the knowledg of all things were to be had. And as the Philoſophers were ignorant in Nature, and the waies of her working; ſo were they more curious, than knowing, in their firſt matter and Phyſical form. For if their firſt matter had any being, it were not then the firſt matter: for, as it is the firſt matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth ſubſiſt. And ſeeing it is neither a ſubſtance perfect, nor a ſubſtance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other ſubſtance ſhould thence take concreſcence, it hath not been taught, neither are theſe forms (ſaith a learned Author) any thing, ſi ex ea eximatur potentia, quæ nihil eſt. Again, how this firſt matter ſhould be ſubjectum formarum, and paſſive, which is underſtood to precede the form, it is hard to conceive: for to make form, which is the cauſe, to be ſubſequent to the thing cauſed (to wit, to the firſt matter) is contrary to all reaſon, divine and humane: only it may be ſaid, that originally there is no other difference between matter and form, than between heat and fire, of which the one cannot ſubſiſt without the other, but in a kind of rational conſideration. Leaving therefore theſe Riddles to their Lovers, who by certain Scholaſtical diſtinctions wreſt and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Ariſtotle hath laboured to prove a falſe eternity of the World, I think it far ſafer to affirm with Saint Auguſtine, That all ſpecies and kinds are from God, from whom, whatſoever is natural proceedeth, of what kind or eſtimation ſoever; from whence are the ſeeds of all forms, and the forms of all ſeeds and their motions; A quo eſt omnis ſpecies, à quo eſt quicquid naturaliter eſt, cujuſcunq; generis eſt, cujuſcunq; æſtimationis eſt; à quo ſunt ſemina formarum, formæ ſeminum, motus ſeminum atq; formarum. And thus much Averrois is forced to confeſs. For all forms (ſaith he) are, in primo motore; which is alſo the opinion of Ariſtotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus upon Dionyſius.

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Starrs have great influence: and that their operations may diverſly be prevented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, ſuch is the diſpute and contention concerning Fate or Deſtinie, of which the opinions of thoſe learned men that have written thereof, may be ſafely received, had they not thereunto annexed and faſtened an inevitable neceſſity, and made it more general, and univerſally powerful than it is, by giving it Dominion over the mind of man, and over his will, of which Ovid, and Juvenal:

Ratio fatum vincere nulla valet.
Servis regna dabunt, captivis Fata triumphos. Juven. ſat. 7. 201.

'Gainſt Fate no counſel can prevaile.
Kingdoms to Slaves by Deſtinie,
To Captives triumphs given be.

An errour of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Phariſees, Priſcillianiſts, the Bardiſaniſts, and others, as Baſil, Auguſtine, and Thomas have obſerved: but that Fate is an obedience of ſecond cauſes to the firſt, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platoniſt. Plotinus out of the Aſtronomers calleth it a diſpoſition from the acts of celeſtial Orbs, unchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the ſame being alſo true enough, in reſpect of all thoſe things which a rational mind doth not order nor direct. Ptolemie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chryſippus, Empedocles, & the Stoicks, ſome of them more largely, others more ſtrictly, aſcribe to Fate a binding and inevitable neceſſity; and that it is the ſame which is ſpoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoq; noſtrum fatus eſt Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starrs are inſtruments of far greater uſe, than to give an obſcure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunſet: it being manifeſt, that the diverſity of ſeaſons, the Winters, and Summers, more hot and cold, are not ſo uncertained by the Sun and Moon alone, who alway keep one and the ſame courſe; but that the Stars have alſo their working therein.

Baſil. Eſſa. 4. Aug. de hæreſ. 70. c. 35. Tho. cont. Gent. 3. cap. 8. 3. Ficin. in 12. de leg. Cic. de fat.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given virtues to Springs and Fountains, to cold Earth, to Plants and Stones, Minerals, and to the excremental parts of the baſeſt living creatures, why ſhould we rob the beautiful Stars of their working powers? for ſeeing they are many in number, and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not think, that in the treaſury of his wiſdome, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every Star) a peculiar virtue and operation; as every herb, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as theſe were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to cover and ſhadow her duſty face, but otherwiſe for the uſe of man and beaſt, to feed them and cure them; ſo were not thoſe uncountable glorious bodies ſet in the Firmament, to no other end, than to adorn it; but for Inſtruments and Organs of his divine Providence, ſo far as it hath pleaſed his juſt will to determine. Origen upon this place of Geneſis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the Stars are not cauſes (meaning perchance binding cauſes;) but are as open Books, wherein are contained and ſet down all things whatſoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wiſdom: which latter part I believe well, and this ſaying of Syracides withall: Tho' there are hid yet greater things than theſe be, and we have ſeen but a few of his works. And though, for the capacity of men, we know ſomewhat, yet in the true and uttermoſt virtues of herbs and plants, which our ſelves ſow and ſet, and which grow under Eccluſ. 42. 21. & 43. 32.

under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestial bodies. For Wisd. 9.16. hardly (saith Solomon) can we discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour find we out those things that are before us: Who can then investigate
Aristotle. the things that are in Heaven? Multum est, de rebus cœlestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen we do not bind God to his Creatures, in this supposed necessity of Destiny; so on the contrary, we do not rob those beautiful Creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes despoiled God of his Prerogative, or had God himself constrained the mind and will of man to impious acts by any celestial inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some, were justifiable; of whom S.
Aug. 20. super Gen. ad lit. Augustine, Impia perversitate in malis factis rectissimè reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potiùs Auctorem Syderum, quàm commissorem scelerum; Where we reprehend them of evil deeds, they again with wicked perverseness urge, that rather the Author and Creator of the Stars, then the doer of the evil, is to be accused.

But that the Stars and other celestial bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora cœlestia (saith Damascene) constituant in nobis habitus, complexiones, & dispositiones; The heavenly bodies (saith he) make in us habits, complexions, and dispositions; for the body
Gal. l. tuor. an. seq. temp. (though Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the mind, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in virtues; for those of cholerick complexions are subject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the Mind hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonless mind, I am resolved: For all those which were created mortal, as Birds, Beasts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites; over all which, celestial bodies (as instruments and executioners of God's Providence) have absolute dominion. What we should judge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell; for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them; so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by virtue and piety prepared, putteth himself altogether under the power of his sensual appetite;
Quint. Vincitur fatum si resistas, vincit si contempseris; Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it; if thou neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the Stars or the Sun have any power over the minds of men immediately, it is absurd to think, other then as aforesaid, as the same by the body's temper may be effected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilium corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsam movet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the
Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 5. Sun (saith S. Augustine) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moveth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The Sun is good to serve, not to sway (saith Hex. lib. 4. de term. 3. S. Ambrose.) And S. Augustine, Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora, God ruleth the bodies below by those above; but he avoucheth not, that superiour bodies have rule over mens minds, which are incorporal.

But howsoever we are by the Stars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation; and Aristotle himself confesseth, that the Heavens do not alwayes work their effects in inferiour bodies, no more than the signs of rain and wind do always come to pass. And it is divers times seen, that paternal virtue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in Juvenck Patrum virtus, In the young Off-spring the Fathers virtue is; and Hor. lib. 4. Od. 30. so on the contrary, Patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an enterchange; the Sons of virtuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice; and of vicious men to virtue.

Egregia est soboles scelerato nata parente:

A worthy Son is born of a wicked Father.

But there is nothing (after God's reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as Education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a Religious instruction and bringing up, may fashion anew and reform them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reins being let loose) the continual fellowship and familiarity, and the examples of dissolute men, may not corrupt and deform. Vessels will ever retain a savour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult either to cleanse the mind once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet savour of virtue first received, when the mind was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable constellation (allowing that the Stars incline the Will) and a virtuous Education do happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding Virtuous or Vicious, Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: for as the seeds of Virtue may by the art and husbandry of Christian counsel produce better and more beautiful fruit, than the strength of Self-nature and Kind could have yielded them; so the Plants apt to grow wild, and to change themselves into weeds, by being set in a soyl suitable, and like themselves, are made more unsavoury and filled with poyson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adjuvabit opus Astrorum, quemadmodum Agricola terræ naturam; A wise man assisteth the work of the Stars, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyl. And Ptolemy himself confesseth thus much, Sapiens, & omina sapientis Medici, dominabuntur Astris; A wise man, and the ominous art of a wise Physitian, shall prevail against the Stars. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Stars, as he did the rest of the Universal; whose influences may be called his reserved and unwritten Laws. But let us consider how they bind: even as the Laws of men do; for although the Kings and Princes of the World have by their Laws decreed, That a Thief and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Judges and Magistrates (the Stars of Kings) executed accordingly; yet these Laws do not deprive Kings of their natural or religious compassion, or bind them without Prerogative, to such a severe execution, as that there should be nothing left of liberty to judgment, power, or conscience: the Law in his own nature, being no other than a deaf Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) do sometimes for causes to themselves known, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves; it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himself, which his Substitutes enjoy; God being Mercy, Goodness, and Charity it self. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us Mat. 6. 13. not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil, had been no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his own Creatures truly) hath assured us, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and Desires may not make frustrate and break asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that Fate or Destiny, though depending upon eternal power, yet being ordered and diſpoſed, had ſuch a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himſelf ſhould in a kind have ſhut up himſelf therein; How miſerable then were the condition of men (ſaith S. Auguſtine) left altogether without hope.

And if this ſtrength of the Stars were ſo transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his Creatures; be he Pagan or Chriſtian that ſo John 17. 4. believeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary Gods of the other, would thereby be deſpoiled of all worſhip, reverence, or reſpect.

And certainly, God which hath promiſed us the reward of well-doing, which Chriſt himſelf claimed at the hands of the Father, (I have finiſhed the work which thou gaveſt me to do?) and the ſame God, who hath threatned unto us the ſorrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be ſo unjuſt, as to bind us inevitably to the Deſtinies or Influences of the Stars, or ſubject our ſouls to any impoſed neceſſity. But it was well ſaid of Plotinus, that the Stars were ſignificant, but not efficient, giving them yet ſomething leſs than their due: and therefore as I do not conſent with them, who would make thoſe glorious Creatures of God virtueleſs: ſo I think that we derogate from His eternal and abſolute power and providence, to aſcribe to them the ſame dominion over our immortal ſouls, which they have over all bodily ſubſtances, and periſhable natures: for the Souls of men loving and fearing God, receive influence from that Divine light it ſelf, whereof the Sun's clarity, and that of the Stars, is by Plato called Plat. pol. 6. Ficin. in l. 7. pol. but a ſhadow, Lumen eſt umbra Dei, Deus eſt lumen luminis; Light is the ſhadow of God's brightneſs, who is the light of light: But to end this queſtion, becauſe this Deſtiny, together with Providence, Preſcience, and Predeſtination, are often confounded, I think it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not obſerved it, though all learned men have.

§. XII.
Of Preſcience.

PReſcience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greeks call Prognoſis, the Latins Præcognitio, or Præſcientia) conſidered in order and nature (if we may ſpeak of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Preſcience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatſoever our ſelves fore-know, except the ſame be to ſucceed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Preſcience of God (as it is Preſcience onely) is not the cauſe of any thing futurely ſucceeding: neither doth God's fore-knowledge impoſe any neceſſity, or bind. For in that we fore-know that the Sun will riſe, and ſet; that all men born in the World ſhall die again; that after Winter the Spring ſhall come; after the Spring, Summer, and Harveſt; and that according to the ſeveral ſeeds that we ſow, we ſhall reap ſeveral ſorts of grain; yet is not our fore-knowledge the cauſe of this, or any of theſe: neither doth the knowledge in us bind or conſtrain the Sun to riſe and ſet, or men to die; for the cauſes (as men perſwade themſelves) are otherwiſe manifeſt and known to all. The eye of man (ſaith Boetius) beholdeth thoſe things ſubject to ſenſe, as they are; the eye ſeeth that ſuch a beaſt is an horſe, it ſeeth men, trees, and houſes, &c. but our ſeeing of them (as they are) is not the cauſe of their ſo being, for ſuch they be in their own natures. And again out of the ſame Author; Divina providentia rebus generandis non imponit neceſſitatem, quia ſi omnia evenirent ex neceſſitate, præmia bonorum, & pœna malorum periret; Divine Providence (ſaith he) impoſeth no neceſſity upon things that are to exiſt; for if all come to paſs of neceſſity, there ſhould neither be reward of good, nor puniſhment of evil. Boetius de Conſol.

§. XIII.
Of Providence.

NOw Providence (which the Greeks call Pronoia) is an intellectual knowledge, both fore-ſeeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all paſt, all preſent, and all to come, but is the cauſe of their ſo being, which Preſcience (ſimply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philoſophers (ſaith S. Auguſtine) is divided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the paſt; Knowledge of the preſent, and Care of the future: and we our ſelves account ſuch a man for provident, as, remembring things paſt, and obſerving things preſent, can by judgment, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times ſucceeding. That ſuch a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every where teach us; Moſes in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Chriſt himſelf and his Apoſtles aſſure us hereof; and beſides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of God; yea the Turks themſelves are ſo confident therein, as they refuſe not to accompany and viſit each other in the moſt peſtilent diſeaſes, nor ſhun any peril whatſoever, though death therein do manifeſtly preſent it ſelf.

The places of Scripture proving Providence, are ſo many, both in general and particular, as I ſhall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: Sing unto God (ſaith David) which covereth the Heavens with Clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the graſs to grow upon the Mountains, which giveth the beaſts their food, and feedeth the young Raven that cries: Pſal. 147. 8 All theſe wait upon thee, that thou mayeſt give them food in due ſeaſon: And thou ſhalt drink of the River Chereth (ſaith God to Eliah) and I have commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowls of the Air, they ſow not, nor reap, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, Are not two Sparrows ſold for a farthing? And one of them ſhall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea, all the hairs of your head are numbred: And Saint Peter, Caſt all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his judgments are written, ſaith David. Pſal. 104. 27. 9. & 145. 15. 1 Reg. 17. 4 Matth. 6. 26 Luke 12, 6. 7. 1 Pet. 5. 7. Pſal. 36. 6.

God therefore, who is every where preſent, Who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whoſe eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance againſt them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be eſteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other; for it is contrary to his own word, Gloriam meam alteri non dabo, I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the King's preſence, but by the King's direction; but God is every where preſent, and King of Kings. The example of God's univerſal Providence is ſeen in his Creatures. The Father provideth for his Children: Beaſts and Birds and all living, for their young ones. If Providence be found in ſecond Fathers, much more in the firſt and Univerſal: and if there be a natural loving care in men, and beaſts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whoſe Divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the Univerſal: Amor divinus rerum omnium eſt principium, & vinculum univerſi (ſaith Plato:) Amor Dei eſt nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobile ſuſtentaculum, ac univerſæ machinæ fundamentum; The love of God is the perpetual knot, and link or chain Jer. 23. 24. Eſay 42. 8. of of the world, and the immovable pillar of every part thereof, and the Basis and foundation of the Universal. God therefore who could onely be the cause of all, can onely provide for all, and sustain all; so as, to absolute power; to every where presence; to perfect goodness; to pure and divine love; this attribute transcendent hability of Providence is onely proper and belonging.

§. XIV.

Of Predestination.

NOw for Predestination, we can difference it no otherwise, from Providence and Prescience, than in this; that Prescience onely fore-seeth; Providence fore-seeth and careth for, and hath respect to all Creatures, even from the brightest Angels of Heaven to the unworthiest Worms of the Earth: and Predestination (as it is used specially by Divines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their salvation properly, in the common use of Divines; or perdition, as some have used it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity. Divers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom Saint Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, useth these words: Quarum est una, quæ prædestinata est in æternum regnare cum Deo, altera æternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reign for ever with God, but the other is to undergo everlasting torment with the Devil; for according to Nonius Marcellus, Destinare, est præparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant Writers, as Calvin, Beza, Bucanus, Danæus, and such like: And as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leave them to the Divines; and why it hath pleased God to create some Vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his own infirmity, perceiveth the reason of his blindness. And again with S. Augustine, Occulta esse causa potest, injusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, unjust it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by Fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

LAstly, seeing Destiny or Necessity is subsequent to God's Providence, and seeing that the Starrs have no other dominion, than is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but, as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei Organum, The art, or artificial Organ of God: And Cusanus, Divini præcepti instrumentum; The instrument of the Divine precept: We may then with better reason reject that kind of Idolatry, or God of fools, called, Fortune or Chance; a Goddess, the most reverenced, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient: for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messeniacks. The Greeks call her Τυχὼ, signifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homer's time this great Lady was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune; yet afterward she grew so great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdoms, to Beggars and Cottages, she ordered all things; Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great and often changes of his Fortune, is said to have used to cry out upon Fortune, applying to her a Verse of Æschilus:

Tu me extulisti eodem meis (sentio) perditum.

Sin. ep. 91. Aur. vict. de Pertinac. Sen. ep. 74.

reasisting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable; valuing the folly of the most foolish, by making the success prosperous: insomuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens lives, but her pastimes: of which Palladius, Vita hominum ludus Fortunæ est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: And because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels, have equal success to those by the best judgment conducted, therefore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience; whereof Athenæus:

Longissimè à Sapientia Fors dissidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen similima:

From Wisedom Fortune differs far,
And yet in works most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the successes of humane actions and endeavours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be given, then was it attributed to Fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of Plato, Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cujus causa legitima non præcesserit; Nothing ever came to pass under the Sun, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferiour, but not besides the intention of the Superiour; Præter intentionem Inferioris, sed non præter intentionem Superioris (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (saith Melanchthon) Quod Poëtæ Fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of Murther, He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death; and if a man hath not laid wait, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomy the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Ax from the helve, whereby another is slain, was the work of God himself; we in our phrase attribute this accident, to Chance or Fortune: And in Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth the most casual and subject to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks, to this effect, That the same power which they called Animam mundi, The soul of the World, was no other than that incomprehensible Wisdom, which we express by the name of God, governing every Being as well in Heaven as in Earth; to which Wisdom and Power they sometime gave the title of Necessity or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appear unto us no certain causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his Questions upon Genesis the first Book: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoever (saith he) thou callest God, be if Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by divers terms, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diversly.

But it may be objected, That if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and evil in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expreſs ſucceſs; how comes it then, that ſo many worthy and wiſe men depend upon ſo many unworthy and empty-headed fools? That riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernel; and ſo many learned, virtuous, and valiant men wear out their lives in poor and dejected eſtates? In a word, there is no other inferiour, or apparent cauſe, beſide the partiality of man's affection, but the faſhioning of our ſelves according to the nature of the times wherein we live: For whoſoever is moſt able, and beſt ſufficient to diſcern, and hath withal an honeſt and open heart and loving truth; if Princes, or thoſe that govern, endure no other diſcourſe than their own flatteries: then, I ſay, ſuch a one, whoſe virtue and courage forbiddeth him to be baſe and a diſſembler, ſhall evermore hang under the wheel; which kind of deſerving well and receiving ill, we alwayes falſly charge Fortune withal. For whoſoever ſhall tell any great Man or Magiſtrate, that he is not juſt; the General of an Army, that he is not valiant; and great Ladies that they are not fair; ſhall never be made a Counſeller, a Captain, or a Courtier. Neither is it ſufficient to be wiſe with a wiſe Prince, valiant with a valiant, and juſt with him that is juſt, for ſuch a one hath no eſtate in his proſperity; but he muſt alſo change with the ſucceſſor, if he be of contrary qualities; ſail with the tyde of the time, and alter form and condition, as the Eſtate or the Eſtate's Maſter changeth: Otherwiſe how were it poſſible, that the moſt baſe men, and ſeparate from all imitable qualities, could ſo often attain to honour and riches, but by ſuch an obſervant ſlaviſh courſe? Theſe men having nothing elſe to value themſelves by, but a counterfeit kind of wondering at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are virtues, and all their duſty actions criſtalline, have yet in all Ages proſpered equally with the moſt virtuous, if not exceeded them. For, according to Menander, Omnis inſipiens, arrogantiâ & plauſibus capitur; Every fool is won with his own pride, and others flattering applauſe: So as whoſoever will live altogether out of himſelf, and ſtudy other mens humours, and obſerve them, ſhall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and virtue (except the ſeaſon wherein he liveth be all of theſe, and of all ſorts of goodneſs, fruitful) ſhall never proſper by the poſſeſſion or profeſſion thereof. It is alſo a token of a wordly wiſe man, not to war or contend in vain againſt the nature of times wherein he liveth: for ſuch a one is often the author of his own miſery; but beſt it were to follow the advice, which the Pope gave the Biſhop of that Age, out of Ovid, while the Arian Hereſie raged:

Dum furor in curſu eſt, currenti cede furori. Ovid. Met. lib 1.

While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man furie's gallop ſtay.

And if Cicero (than whom that world begat not a man of more reputed Judgment) had followed the counſel of his Brother Quintus, Potuiſſet (ſaith Petrarch) in lectulo ſuo mori, potuiſſet integro cadavere ſepeliri; He might then have died the death of nature, and been with an untorn and undiſſevered body buried; For, as, Petrarch in the ſame place noteth, Quid ſtultius quàm deſperantem, (præſertim de effectu) litibus perpetuis implicari? What more fooliſh than for him that deſpairs (eſpecially of the effect) to be entangled with endleſs contentions? Whoſoever therefore will ſet before him Machiavel's two marks to ſhoot at (to wit) Riches, and Glory, muſt ſet on and take off a back of Iron to a weak wooden Bow, that it may fit both the ſtrong and the feeble; for as he who firſt deviſed to add ſails to rowing Veſſels, did either ſo proportion them as being faſtened aloft, and towards the head of his Maſt, he might abide all winds and ſtorms, or elſe he ſometime or other periſhed by his own invention: ſo that man which prizeth virtue for it ſelf, and cannot endure to hoiſe and ſtrike his ſails, as the divers natures of calms and ſtorms require, muſt cut his ſails and his cloth of mean length and breadth, and content himſelf with a ſlow and ſure navigation, (to wit) a mean and free eſtate. But of this diſpute of Fortune, and the reſt, or whatſoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or cauſes, the wit (or rather fooliſhneſs) of man hath found out: Let us reſolve with Saint Paul, who hath taught us, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him, and one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diverſities of operations, but God is the ſame which worketh all in all. 1 Cor. c. 8. v. 6. c. 12. v. 6.

CHAP. II.

Of Man's eſtate in his firſt Creation, and of God's reſt.

§. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which Man was firſt created.

Gen. 1. 26.

THe creation of all other Creatures being finiſhed, the Heavens adorned, and the Earth repleniſhed, God ſaid, Let us make man in our own Image, according to our likeneſs.

Triſ. Aſcl. 2. & de volunt. Dei. Plat. leg. l. 1.

Man is the laſt and moſt admirable of God's works to us known: Ingens miraculum homo; Man is the greateſt wonder (ſaith Plato out of Mercurius;) Naturæ ardentiſſimæ artificium, The artificial work of the moſt ardent or fire-like nature (as ſaith Zoroaſter) though the ſame be meant, not for any excellency external, but in reſpect of his internal form, both in the Nature, Qualities, and other Attributes thereof: in nature, becauſe it hath an eſſence, immortal, and ſpiritual; in qualities, becauſe the ſame was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, becauſe man was made Lord of the World, and of the Creatures therein.

Sanctius his animal, mentiſq; capacius altæ,
Deerat adhuc, & quod dominari in cætera poſſet:
Natus homo eſt. Sanctum, quia pars prior immortalis, anima, quâ in mortali. In locum Ovid. Met. l. 1. 76.

More holy than the reſt, and underſtanding more,
A living creature wants, to rule all made before.
So man began to be.

Of this Image and Similitude of God, there is much diſpute among the Fathers, Schoolmen, & late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceive, that man was made after the Image of God, in reſpect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chryſoſtom, Ambroſe, and ſome others: which S. Ambroſe denieth to the woman in theſe words, Ut ſicut Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus; & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus eſſet ſuper faciem totius terræ: unus igitur, unum fecit, qui unitatis ejus haberet imaginem; That as God is one

one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewiſe of one man the whole kind ſhould be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that ſhould have the Image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the ſame Verſe, that man was after the Image of God in reſpect of rule and power; it is written Dominamini in the plural number; and let them rule over the fiſh in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that Man is ſaid to be after the Image of God in reſpect of his immortal ſoul onely: becauſe as God is inviſible, ſo the ſoul of man is inviſible; as God is immortal and incorporal, ſo is the ſoul of Man immortal and incorporal; and as there is but one God which governeth the World, ſo but one ſoul which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, ſo is the ſoul of man wholly in every part of the body: Anima eſt tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The ſoul is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Ariſtotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men deny that Doctrine; which that it is otherwiſe than potentially true, all the Ariſtotelians in the World ſhall never prove. Theſe and the like arguments do the Jews make (ſaith Toſtatus) and theſe reſemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The School-men reſemble the Mind or Soul of Man to God, in this reſpect eſpecially; becauſe that as in the Mind there are three diſtinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Underſtanding, and Will; and yet all theſe being of real differences, are but one Mind: ſo in God there are three diſtinct perſons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, and yet but one God. They alſo make the Image and Similitude divers; and again, they diſtinguiſh between Imaginem Dei, and ad Imaginem Dei; and ſpin into ſmall threds with ſubtile diſtinctions, many times the plainneſs and ſincerity of the Scriptures: their wits being like that ſtrong water, that eateth thorough and diſſolveth the pureſt Gold. Victorinus alſo maketh the Image of God to be ſubſtantial, but not the ſimilitude: Sed in ſubſtantia nomen qualitatis declarativum; A word declaring quality in the ſubſtance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the Image and Similitude do greatly differ, ſo the ſinful ſoul doth not therefore leave to be the Image of God; but it hath not his Similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Auguſtine alſo againſt Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by ſin, the perfection of this Image is loſt in man; and in his Retractations maintaineth the ſame opinion, and alſo affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, than the Image.

But howſoever the School-men and others diſtinguiſh, or whatſoever the Fathers conceive; ſure I am, that S. Paul maketh the ſame ſence of the Image, which Victorinus doth of the ſimilitude, who ſaith: As we have born the Image of the earthly, ſo ſhall we bear the Image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scripture, that the words Image and Similitude were uſed but in one ſence, and in this place the better to expreſs each other; whatſoever Lombard hath ſaid to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himſelf in the Scriptures, which neither Moſes, the Prophets, or Apoſtles, ever conceived. Now as S. Paul uſeth the word (Image) for both: ſo S. James uſeth the word (Similitude) for both, in theſe words: Therewith bleſs we God even the Father, and therewith curſe we Men, which are made after the ſimilitude of God. Howſoever therefore S. Auguſtine ſeemeth, out of a kind of elegancy in writing, to make ſome difference: as where he writeth, Confitemur imaginem in æternitate, ſimilitudinem in moribus inveniri; we confeſs that this Image is found in eternity, but his ſimilitude in manners, that is in the ſpiritual diſpoſitions and qualities of the mind; yet thus he elſewhere ſpeaketh plainly: Quaſi verò poſſit eſſe imago aliqua, in qua ſimilitudo non ſit: ſi enim omnino ſimilis non eſt, procul dubio nec imago eſt; As if (ſaith he) there could be any image, where the ſimilitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeneſs, there is no image. The very words of the Text make this moſt manifeſt, as, Let us make man in our image, according to our likeneſs; which is, Let us make man in our image, that he may be like us: and in the next Verſe following, God himſelf maketh it plain; for there he uſeth the word (Image) only as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all diſpute or ambiguity, in the firſt Verſe of the fifth Chapter, the word (Similitude) is uſed again by it ſelf, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeneſs of God made he him. And this ſimilitude S. Paul, Coloſ. the third, calleth the Image; Put on (ſaith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may believe S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other School-men, then it is as manifeſt as words can make it, that the image and ſimilitude is but the ſame; for S. Paul uſeth both the words directly in one ſence. For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the ſimilitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to prove, that Man was formed after the image of God, both in body and mind: Nulla pars in homine, quæ non fuerit hujuſce imaginis particeps; No part in a man (ſaith he) which was not participating Gods image; for God ſaid, Let us make man according to our own image. But the ſoul alone is not man, but the Hypoſtaſis or whole man compounded of body and ſoul. The body of man (ſaith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcoſmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was firſt in God, ſo that man, according to his body, muſt needs be the image of God. Againſt which opinion of this learned man, his own objection ſeemeth to me ſufficient, where he allegeth that it may be ſaid, that Moſes ſpake by the figure Synechdoche, As when a man is called a mortal man, yet is not the whole man mortal, but the body onely: ſo when God ſaid, Let us make man after our image, he meant the ſoul of man, and not the body of earth and duſt: Maledictus qui Deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (ſaith S. Auguſtine:) Curſed is he that referreth the Deity of God to the lineaments of man's body: Deus enim non eſt humanæ formæ particeps, neque corpus humanum divinæ (ſaith Philo;) God is not partaker of humane form, nor humane body of the form divine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tſelem, which ſignifieth a ſhadow or obſcure reſemblance: In imagine pertranſit homo; Man paſſeth away in a ſhadow: Let us then know and conſider, that God, who is eternal and infinite, hath not any bodily ſhape or compoſition; for it is both againſt his Nature and his Word; an errour of the Anthropomorphitæ; againſt the very eſſence and Majeſty of God.

Zanch. de oper. Dei. l. 3. c. 1.

In Gen.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine underſtanding than theſe groſs Hereticks: Ad ſimilitudinem Dei propiùs accedebat humana virtus, quàm figura; The virtue which is in man (ſaith he) came nearer the ſimilitude of God than the figure. For God is a ſpiritual ſubſtance, inviſible, and moſt ſimple; God is a juſt God, God is Merciful, God is Charity it ſelf, and (in a word) Goodenſs it ſelf, and none elſe ſimply good. And thus much it hath pleaſed God himſelf to teach us, and to make us know of himſelf. What then can be the ſhadow of ſuch a ſubſtance, the image of ſuch a nature, or wherein can man be ſaid to reſemble his unexcogitable power and perfectneſs perfectneſs? Certainly, not in Dominion alone; for the Devil is ſaid to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdom of Chriſt was not thereof, who was the true and perfect Image of his Father: Neither becauſe man hath an immortal ſoul, & therein the faculties of Memory, Underſtanding, and Will; for the Devils are alſo immortal, and participate thoſe faculties, being called Dæmones, becauſe ſcientes of knowledge and ſubtilty: Neither becauſe we are reaſonable creatures, by which we are diſtinguiſhed from beaſts: For who have rebelled againſt God? Who have made gods of the vileſt beaſts, of Serpents, of Catts, of Owls, yea, even of ſhameful parts, of luſts and pleaſures, but reaſonable men? Yet do I not condemn the opinion of S. Chryſoſtom and Ambroſe, as touching Dominion, but that, in reſpect thereof, man was in ſome ſort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, ſuch as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Juſtice and Piety; for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fiſhes of the Sea, the Fowls of Heaven (or of the Air) and over the Beaſts of the Field; But God gave unto man a dominion over men, he appointed Kings to govern them, and Judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude Reaſon, as it is the ability of Underſtanding. For I do not conceive, that Irenæus did therefore call Man, the image of God, becauſe he was animal rationale onely; but that he underſtood it better, with Sybilla; Imago mea eſt homo, rectam rationem habens, Man that is endued with right reaſon is ſaid to reſemble God, (that is) by right reaſon to know and confeſs God his Creator, and the ſame God to ſerve, love, and obey: and therefore S. Auguſtine (who herein came nearer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & ſimilitudinem ſuam in mente; God made man in reſpect of the intellect after his own image and ſimilitude; And Reynerius, Homo, quod habet mentem, factus eſt ad imaginem Dei; Man was made after the image of God, in mind, or, in that he hath a mind.

§. II.

Of the Intellectual mind of man, in which there is much of the Image of God; and that this Image is much deformed by Sin.

But Mens is not taken here for anima phyſica, according to Ariſtotle, which is, forma vel natura hominis, The form or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principal ſtrength of the mind, or ſoul, cujus actus eſt perepetua veritatis contemplatio; whoſe act, exerciſe, or office, is the perpetual contemplation of truth; and therefore it is alſo called Intellectus divinus, intellectus contemplativus, & anima contemplativa, A divine underſtanding, and an intellect or mind contemplative. Eſt autem mens noſtra (ſaith Cuſanus) vis comprehendendi; & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compoſitum: Our intellectual mind (ſaith he) is a power of comprehending; even the whole, that is in this kind powerful, compounded of all the powers of comprehenſion: unto which Mercurius attributeth ſo much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he eſteemeth it to be the very eſſence of God (which was alſo the errour of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwiſe ſeparate from God (ſaith he) than the light from the Sun: for this Mens or underſtanding (ſaith Mercurius) eſt Deus in hominibus, Is God in men; or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For, as the Sun is not of the ſame eſſence or nature with the divine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; ſo is this Mens or underſtanding in men, not of the eſſence of Gods infinite underſtanding, but a power and faculty of our ſouls the pureſt; or, the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternal light illightned. And this Mens, others call Animam animæ, The ſoul of the ſoul; or, with S. Auguſtine, the eye of the ſoul, or receptacle of Sapience and divine Knowledge, Quæ amorem ſapientiæ tanquam ducem ſequitur, Which followeth after the love of ſapience as her guide (ſaith Philo;) between which and reaſon; between which and the mind, called anima; between which and that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference: Reaſon, is that faculty by which we judge and diſcourſe; Anima, by which we live. Hereof it is ſaid, Anima corpus animat, id eſt, vivificat; or, The ſoul is that which doth animate the body, that is, giveth it life; for death is the ſeparation of body and ſoul: and the ſame ſtrength (ſaith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the ſame hath this Anima, or mind, or, ſoul in Man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Baſil agreeth, which called this Mens, or divine underſtanding, Perſpicacem animæ partem, The perceiving part of the mind, or, The light by which the ſoul diſcerneth: Dormientum mens, non anima, ſopitur; & in furioſis mens extinguitur, anima manet: In men that ſleep it is this (mens, or) underſtanding, and not the mind or ſoul, which reſteth, during which time it is but habitual in wiſe men, and in mad men this (mens) is extinguiſhed, and not the ſoul; for mad men do live, though diſtract.

Therefore this word being often uſed for the Soul giving life, is attributed abuſively to mad men, when we ſay that they are of a diſtract mind, in ſtead of a broken underſtanding: which word (Mind) we uſe alſo for Opinion, as, I am of this mind, or, that mind: and ſometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, He is of an Honeſt mind, or, a man of a juſt mind: ſometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mind's ſake: and Ariſtotle ſometimes uſeth this word (Mens) for the phantaſie, which is the ſtrength of the imagination: ſometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without diſcourſe: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels, and Intelligences: but as it is uſed in the proper ſignification, including both the underſtanding agent and poſſible, it is deſcribed to be, A pure, ſimple, ſubſtantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his firſt object: or more at large, thus; A part or particle of the ſoul, whereby it doth underſtand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from paſſion coming from without, and apt to be diſſevered, as, eternal from that which is mortal. Hereof excellently Mercurius; Anima eſt imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præeſt, mens animæ, anima corpori; The Soul (meaning that which giveth life) is the image of this underſtanding, or Mens; and this (Mens) or underſtanding is the image of God. God is Preſident or Ruler over this underſtanding, this underſtanding over the Soul, and this Soul over the body. This diviſion and diſtinction out of the Platonicks, and Peripateticks, I leave to the Reader to judge of. object to the understanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be understood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to be his understanding and mind, as colours are to the sight; whence it so followeth, that the imagination or phantasy it self is to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing: and as this is an Organum, so that. Of this question, How the mind in all her actions maketh use of the body, and hath communion with the body, I refer the Reader to a most grave and learned Discourse in the last Reply of M. D. Bilson, late Bishop of Winchester, unto Hen. Jacob. Howsoever the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the mind it self, by which we live, nor in respect of our souls simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the Image of God. But most safely may we resemble our selves to God in mente, and in respect of that pure faculty, which is never separate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all; For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the Mind or Soul, and between the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God: whose words are these, Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, seque intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of S. Augustine;) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere, ac diligere cum à quo facta est, (that is) The Mind (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembreth, understandeth, and loveth it self; but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear Basil; Homo ad Imaginem & Similitudinem Dei factus est Peccatum vero Imaginis hujus pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiæ affectibus immersit: Man was made after the Image and Similitude of God, but Sin hath deformed the beauty of this Image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscence.

Pag. 185. & sequent. Ad imaginem Dei creavit illum, id est, sapientiæ, virtutis, ac bonitatis compotem, qui sese intuitus Creatorem agnoscret suum; atque imitari, pro ingenii, prog; auctoritatis, sibi concessæ ratione, studeret. Exam.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortality, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it self, nor in all these joyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the Soul, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Original righteousness, most perfectly infused by God into the Mind and Soul of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the seal of God's Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which, joyned to the Soul, is a part of the Essential Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountiful grace of the Lord of all goodness, who breathed the life into Earth, and contrived within the Trunk of Dust and Clay, the inimitable hability of his own Piety and Righteousness.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) do those that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandments they exercise the Office or Magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walk in the ways of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retain this Image, as they fear, love, and serve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and do not bruise and deface his Seal by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstinate sins. For the unjust mind cannot be after the Image of God, seeing God is Justice it self; The blood-thirsty hath it not, for God is Charity and Mercy it self; Falshood, cunning, practice, and ambition, are properties of Satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soul, together with God: and to be short, there is no likelihood between pure light and black darkness, between beauty and deformity, or between righteousness and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common understanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this Image of God's goodness, which the sensual souls of Beasts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude natural more inclinable to follow and embrace the false and dureless pleasures of this Stage-play World, than to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of God's Wisdom, and the liberality of his Mercy, formed eyes to our souls, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest Heavens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Mind and Soul, to contemplate the everduring Glory, and term-less Joy, prepared for those which retain the Image and Similitude of their Creatour, preserving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteousness, and Holiness, as saith S. Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by S. Augustine, with whom S. Ambrose joyneth, that by sin, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it self: both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for, either it is considered according to natural gifts, and consisteth therein; namely, to have a reasonable and understanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sin than the very reasonable or understanding nature, &c. is lost, (or sin doth not abolish and take away these natural gifts:) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernatural gifts, namely, of divine Grace and heavenly Glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the natural Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out, and destroyed by Sin.

§. III.

Of our base and frail Bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal Soul.

THE external man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or (according to the signification of the word, Adam) of Adamath, of red Earth, or ex limo terræ, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghaphar adamath (id est) ex pinguissima & mollissima; Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth, or Dust, God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

Arias Mont. d. nat. f. 156.

That, man was formed of Earth and Dust did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble fear he called unto God, to save Sodom: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speak, I that am but dust and ashes: And, In these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, do our souls inhabit, according to Job. And though our own eyes do every where behold the sudden and resistless assaults of Death, and Nature assureth us by never-failing experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times upon the Earth have neither certainty nor durability; that our Bodies are but the Anvils of pain and diseases, and our Minds the Hives of unnumbred cares, sorrows, and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which Envy and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappiness of our condition, tion, and the dark ignorance which covers the eyes of our understanding, that we onely prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassal and Slave of death, and forget altogether (or onely remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortal Soul, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortal parts of virtuous men: seeing Gods justice in the one, and his goodness in the other, is exercised for evermore, as the ever-living subjects of his reward and punishment. But when isit that we examine this great account? Never whilewe have one vanity left us to spend: we plead for Titles, till our breath fail us; dig for Riches, while our strength enableth us; exercise Malice, while we can revenge; and then when time hath beaten from us both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it self hateth the house of old age, we remember with Job 10. 21. & 17. 13. Job, that we must go the way from whence we shall not return, and that our bed is made ready for us in the dark; And then, I say, looking over-late into the bottom of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked up from us all our lives,) we behold therein the fearful Images of our actions past, and withall this Eccl. 12. 14. terrible Inscription: That God will bring every work into judgment, that man hath done under the Sun.

But what examples have ever moved us? what perswasions reformed us? or what threatnings made us afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaid before us, we hear what is promised and threatned: but the World's bright glory hath put out the eyes of our minds, and these betraying lights, (with which we onely see) do neither look up towards term-less joyes, nor down towards endless sorrows, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing else at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil denique morbi
Egerunt, fuimus, qui nunc sumus; iisque periclis.
Tentati: nihilo meliores reddimur unquam,
Sub vitiis nullo culparum sine manentes.

Diseases, famine, enemies, in us no change have wrought,
What er'st we were, we are; still in the same snare caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend;
In Vice we dwell, in Sin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal Souls herein; for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) even a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his Laws and Precepts. Frustra sperant qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vain, saith Bernard, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercy.

§. IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his creation.

IN this frame and carcass God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living Soul: (that is) God gave a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soul spiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men use, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortality into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as love and Job 33. 4. fear him. The Spirit of God (saith Elihu in Job) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life: In qua sententia (saith Rabanus) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formásse corpus hominis, vel fancibus aut labiis suis inspirásse in facem formati, ut vivere posset & spiraculum vitæ habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tuæ fecerunt me, &c. tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est, juxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari) loquutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the beggarliness of carnal sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should think, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with jaws or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the Spirit of life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hands have made me, spake this Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custome which men use in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturas sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnal sense? By this breath was infused into man, both life and soul, and therefore this (Soul) the Philosophers call Animam, quæ vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, saith Job; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soul of man, returneth again to God that gave it, as the body returneth unto the Earth, out of which it was taken; according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall return to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the Soul; as when Stephen cried unto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum, Lord Jesus receive my spirit: and in S. John, And Jesus bowed his head and gave up the Ghost, or Spirit; (which was) that his life and soul left his body dead. And that the immortal soul of man differeth from the souls of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our own Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life; so shall they again be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath everlasting, which God breathed into Man, shall, according to Ecclesiastes, return again to God that gave it.

§. V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

MAn, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or model, or brief Story in the Universal: in whom God concluded the Creation, and work of the World, and whom he made the last, and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a divine understanding, by which he might contemplate, and serve his Creatour, after whose Image he was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might govern and rule the World, and all other God's Creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living natures, (to wit) Angelical, Rational, and Brutal; giving to Angels an intellectual, and to Beasts a sensual nature, he vouchsafed unto Man, both the intellectual of Angels, the sensitive of Beasts, and the proper rational belonging unto man: and therefore (saith Gregory Nazianzene) Homo est utriusque naturæ vinculum, Man is the bond and chain which tieth together both Natures: and because in the little frame of man's body there is a representation of the Universal, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmus, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem fecit, velut alterum quendam mundum, in brevi magnum, atque exiguo totum, in terris statuit; God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World; the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust, was formed the flesh of man, and therefore heavy and lumpish: the bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rocks and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which Ovid:

From thence our Kind hard-hearted is, a stony nature are.

His blood, which disperseth it self by the branches of veins through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by Brooks and Rivers over all the earth; his breath to the Air, his natural heat to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it self, which, stirred up by the heat of the Sun, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radical Moisture, Oyl, or Balsamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertility of the Earth; the hairs of mans body, which adorns, or overshadows it, to the grass, which covereth the upper face and Skin of the Earth; our generative power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the leight, wandring, and unstable clouds, carried every where with uncertain winds; our eyes to the light of the Sun and Moon; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sun's heat, dry up and wither away, or the fierce puffs of wind blow them from the stalks; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure understanding (formerly called Mens, and that which always looketh upwards) to those intellectual Natures, which are always present with God; and lastly, our immortal souls (while they are righteous) are by God himself beautified with the title of his own Image and Similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no man just, or good, or righteous (for, In Angelis deprehensa est stultitia, Behold, He found folly in his Angels, saith Job); yet, with such a kind of difference, as there is between the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodness in men: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called Man, the Image and Similitude of his own Righteousness. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the Universal (man being the measure of all things, Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the four Complexions resemble the four Elements, and the seven Ages of man the seven Planets; Whereof, our infancie is compared to the Moon, in which we seem only to live and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the days of Love, Desire, and Vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the strong, flourishing, and beautiful age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seek honour and Victory, and in which our thoughts travel to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take accompt of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our understanding; the last and seventh, to Saturn, wherein our days are sad, and over-cast, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loss which can never be repaired, that of all our vain passions and affections past, the sorrow onely abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made unsociable to others, we become a burthen to our selves: being of no other use, then to hold the riches we have from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternal habitation, which we pass on unto with many sighs, groans, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowful business of a wretched life; towards which we always travel both sleeping and waking: neither have those beloved companions of honour and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soever we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death, whose doors lie open at all hours, and to all persons. For this tide of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetual Ebb and falling Stream, but never floweth again; our Leaf once fallen, springeth no more; neither doth the Sun or the Summer adorn us again, with the garments of new Leaves and Flowers.

For if there were any baiting place, or rest, in the course or race of man's life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in natural living things, and as the sap and juyce, wherein the life of Plants is preserved, doth evermore ascend or descend; so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing toward ripeness and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottenness and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himself.

THese be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, unto whom God in his Creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberal choice of all things, with one onely Prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortal and immortal Life, a natueral celestial and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himself, to be his own Guide, his own Workman, and his own Painter, that he might frame or describe unto himself what he pleased, and make election of his own form. God made man in the beginning, (saith Siracides) and left him in the hands of his own counsel. Such was the liberality of God, and man's felicity: whereas Beasts, and all other Creatures reasonless, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius), and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the Nature, which they could not change; and the supernal Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetual eternity. But (as aforesaid) God gave unto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of Plants, the sensual of Beasts, the rational of Man, and the intellectual of Angels; whereof which soever he took pleasure to plant and cultive, the same should futurely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was ænigmatically described by Asclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandula) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagoreans, and antient Poets, wherein it was fained, That men were transformed into divers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutality, from Virtue to Vice, from Meekness to Cruelty, and from Justice to Oppression. For by the lively Image of other creatures did those Antients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortal men; as by Serpents were signified Deceivers; by Lyons, Oppressors and Cruel men; by Swine, Men given over to lust and sensuality; by Wolves, ravening, and greedy men; which also S. Matthew resembleth to false Prophets, which come to you in sheeps cloathing, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves: by the Images of stones and stocks, foolish and ignorant Men: by Vipers, ungrateful Men: of which S. John Baptist, O ye generation of Vipers, &c.

Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the Universal created was exceeding good.

IN this work of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man; and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; With whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the World made, and the Creatures therein to themselves: for My Father worketh to this day (saith Christ), and I work; but God rested (that is) he created no new Species or kinds of Creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto man a power generative, and so to the rest of living Creatures, to Plants and Flowers, their seeds in themselves; and commanded Man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth Creatures according to their several kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his Works were good; not that he foreknew not, and comprehended not, the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth; but he gave to all things which he had created the name of Good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple purity and from so excellent a cause there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality; and for the cruelty of man's heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all Creatures of the first Age destroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those Creatures which the Ark contained, reserved by God to repleniſh the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the Seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that men should erre.

COncerning the first Habitation of man, we read, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, Gen. 2. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the Opinions and Judgments have been in effect, as divers, among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: Some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestrial Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geography, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way how to find out and judge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation; or, trusting to their own judgments, understood one place for another; and one Errour is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so observant Sectators of those Masters, whom they admired and believed in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores, magnorum virorum authoritate persuasi, transmittimus; We pass over many gross errours, by the authority of great men led and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were far wide from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I my self dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their Learning and their Piety, and yet not bound to follow them any further, than they are guided ded by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himself, GOD hath distributed unto men such a proportion of Knowledg, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakness: Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. Saint Paul confess'd that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third Heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himself acknowledgeth thus much, That neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledg is infinite, it is God (according to S. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi invenitur, (saith Job)? But where is wisdom found? and where is the place of understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens judgments (which inhabit in houses of Clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men, excusable in particular, especially in those whereupon our salvation depended not.

§. II.

A recital of strange Opinions touching Paradise.

NOw touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired, Whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mystical, and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others, have affirmed; and that under the names of those four Rivers Pison, Gehon, Hiddekel, and Perath, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge, there were delivered unto us other mysteries and significations; as, that by the four Rivers, were meant the four Cardinal Virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence; or (by other) Oyl, Wine, Milk, and Honey. This Allegorical understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was again by Franciscus Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis;) whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himself doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his Fifth Book, fol. 338. the last Edition.

Bartas. sem. 2. l. 1. 143.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third Heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our Souls; to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or Garden of Paradise, was meant the Soul or Mind; by Adam, Mens, or, Understanding; by Eve, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and evil, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the virtues of the mind, or in the mind planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon the first of the Corinth. c. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestial and terrestrial Paradise; the one into which S. Paul was wrapt, the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysamensis was of opinion, that a Paradise had been; but that there was not now any mark thereof on the Earth: the same being not onely defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

Amb. de Parad.

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; To which opinion, Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two several places. First, upon this; Fill the Earth, Gen. 10. Of which he gives this judgment. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominatum universis animantibus, subjicite terram, clarissimè docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut tum erat) fructibus consitam, sedem & hortum illum Adæ, & posteritatis futuræ fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over every creature, do clearly shew, that the Universal earth, set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was,) was the garden and seat of Adam, and of his future posterity. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts, Cap. 17. Apostolus ex uno sanguine omne genus humanum ideò factum docet, ut habitarent super universam faciem terræ: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this Opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar Garden; which place Goropius findeth near the River of Acesines, in the Confines of India.

Vers. 26.

Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradise under the Equinoctial; and Postellus, quite contrary, under the North-pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs; who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament onely, or else would have it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Air. Strabus, and Rabanus, were both sick of this vanity, with Origen, and Philo: So was our Venerable Beda, and Peter Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins sayes of Philo Judæus, that he wondred, Quo malo genio afflatus, By what evil Angel he was blown up into this errour; so can I but greatly marvel at the learned men, who so grosly and blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, do so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Provinces bordering it, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the Points of the Compass upon which it lay, in respect of Judea, or Canaan.

Noviomagus also upon Beda, De natura rerum, believeth that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, That the Ocean was that Fountain from whence the four Rivers, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning; for he could not think it possible, that these Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountain, were it not out of the Fountain of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true local Paradise Eastward in the Countrey of Eden.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the Earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the Man whom he had made: and howsoever the vulgar Translation, called Jerom's Translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverit Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For, what sense hath this Translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a Garden in Pleasure, or, that a River went out of pleasure to water the Garden? But the Seventy Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, The Paradise of Eden; and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a Place, and for a Noun appellative; which Region, in respect of the fertility of the Soil, of the many beautiful Rivers and goodly Woods, and that the Trees (as in the Indies) do always keep their leaves, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, Pleasantness, or delicacy; as the Spaniards call the Country, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sence of the word, That as Florida was a Country, so called for the flourishing beauty thereof; so was Eden a Region, called Pleasure, or Delicacy, for its pleasure or delicacy: and as Florida signifieth Flourishing; so Eden signifieth Pleasure: and yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called Pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choise seat of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of Pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the Translation of the Seventy; to the antient Greek Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Gregory; and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Solomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Severinus, Damascenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio; for Damascene's own words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter consitus; Paradise is a place marvellously planted by the hands of God in Eden, towards the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of latter times, do both understand these words of Eden and of the East, contrary to the vulgar Translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their own words; After this I will begin to speak of Paradise Terrestrial, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantâsse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissimè prodit, Paradisum à Deo consitum in regione terræ Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen, apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus, Cham habitâsse ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For Moses (saith he) doth shew most clearly, that Pardise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrey, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis. where we read, that Cham dwelt on the East border of Heden. Pererius endeavoureth to qualifie this Translation; for this Particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the Creation, and not to the very first day; alledging this place of Christ, Joh. 8. 44 that although the Devil was said to be a Man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I think (referring my self to better judgment) the Devil was from the instant of his fall a Man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till man's Creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierom (if that be his Translation) adviseth himself better in the end of the Third Chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis, Cherubin; and Pererius himself acknowledgeth, that this is the true sence of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew, Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; He set on the East side Gen. 3. 24. of the Garden of Heden, a Cherubin. Becanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sence; That God planted a Garden with Pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, onely to the end to find Paradise upon the River of Asecines; for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the Tree of knowledg of good and evil, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which Conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Verse 16.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custom of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly over Paradise (saith Damascenus:) affirming, that we always pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Solomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their service and divine ceremonies, always towards the West, thereby to avoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Judea, yet it was West from Persia) and the serving of God is every where in the world; the matter is not great, which way we turn our faces, so our hearts stand right; other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selves to the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adam's fall we have lost the Paradise on Earth; so by Christ's Death and Passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise Celestial, and the Kingdom of Heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other mystery in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, than to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Judea and Canaan: for the Scriptures always called the people of those Nations, the Sons of the East which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Persia: of which Ovid,

Eurus ad Auroram, Nabatheaq; regna recessit,
Persidaque, & radiis juga subdita matutinis.

The East wind with Aurora hath a biding
Among th' Arabian and the Persian Hills,
Whom Phœbus first salutes at his first rising.

And if it be objected, That Jeremy the Prophet, threatning the destruction of Jerusalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those Nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it self stood North from Jerusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giveth best satisfaction: for he useth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (à principio) id est, (saith he) à prima orbis parte; and afterward he affirmeth, that à principio, and ad Orientem, have the same signification: From the beginning, and East-ward, is all one; à Principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to return to the proof of this place, and that this story of Mankind was not Allegorical, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. and 9. Verse, in these words; For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meat, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam else-where as in the World at large, and then put him into the Garden: and the end why, is expres'd; that he might dress it and keep it: Paradise be- Verse 18. ing a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withal) good for meat: which proveth that Paradise was a terrestrial Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to Verse 10. make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of Allegorical construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a River; expressing also the Region, out of which this River sprang, which he he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Country near unto Charon in Mesopotamia, Ezekiel witnesseth. Ezek. 27. 23.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words; Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons; si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates; non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore, non est Adam, non sunt homines, sed veritas jam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias revocantur; If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no Fountain, and then no River; if no River, then no such four heads or branches, and then not any such River as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates; no such fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves; Eve then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called back into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome upon Daniel; Contiteſcant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent Allegoriæ Legibus se debere subruere: Let the dotage of them be silent, who following shadows and images in the Truth, endeavour to subvert the Truth it self, and think that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Rivers, and the Trees, under the Rules of Allegory.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Story, is the place made more manifest. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of Knowledg excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth Verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all Beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these Beasts were neither in the Third Heaven, nor near the circle of the Moon, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmatical or mystical, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel, speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings, useth this speech; All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, envied him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated, to be terrestrial: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple style, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpose, to take away all scruple from the incredulity of future Ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecy) to be apt to fabulous inventions; and that if he had not described both the Region and the Rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Hebrites and others after them, would have misconstrued this Story of Man-kind. And, is it likely, there would have been so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had been an Utopia? For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrah stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their unnatural sin purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proveth plainly, that Paradise it self, exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and soil of far exceeding excellency. Ezek. 31. 9. Gen. 13. 10.

Besides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcinous's Gardens, as Justin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. And whence are their praises of the Elizian fields, but out of the Story of Paradise? To which also appertain those Verses of the Golden Age in Ovid:

Ver erat æternum; placidique tepentibus auris, Mulcebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores. Ovid. Met.

The joyful Spring did ever last,
And Zephyrus did breed
Sweet flowers by his gentle blast,
Without the help of Seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and, after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Sectators, did greatly enrich their Inventions, by venting the stoln Treasures of Divine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conversions, as if they had been conceived out of their own speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we find what Region Heden, or Eden was; if we prove the River that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was divided into four Branches, together with the Kingdoms of Havila, and Cush; and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Desarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceive that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the Allegorical sence of the Scripture; for as well in this were many figures of Christ, as in all the Old Testament throughout: the Story being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiæ: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantùm (id est) Ecclesia: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt; (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will have it altogether corporal: a second of those, which conceive it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third Opinion, S. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable judgment: Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & hujus sanctissimum nemus sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est præditum; (that is) As man was created at one time, both sensible, and intelligible, so was this holy Grove, or Garden, to be taken both ways, and endued with a double form. Aug. de Civit. Dei. l. 13. c. 21. Suidas in verbo Paradisus.

§. IV.

Why it should be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

But it may be objected, that it is needless, and a kind of curiosity to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, That there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Story be necessary, then by the place proved, the same is also made more apparent. For if we should conceive that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted up as high as the Moon; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the known World; from whence, Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to have come into Judea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would give any credit unto it. For what could seem more ridiculous than the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pison should be Ganges, which watereth the East India; and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt: and these two Rivers so far distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these streams can no way be comprised therein?

Secondly,

Secondly, if the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were said to have been in some such Countrey, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had been performed in the Air, or no place certainly known: I assure my self, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should relie, or give place to the judgment of some Writers upon this place of Genesis, (though otherwise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no Fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the World so set by it self, and separated, as to hang in the Air under the circle of the Moon? or who so doltish to conceive, that from thence the four Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall down, and run under all the Ocean, and rise up again in this our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found? which lest any man think that I enforce, or strain to the worst, these are Peter Comestor's own words. Est autem locus amœnissimus, longo terræ & maris tractu à nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adeò elevatus, ut usque ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable Zone, by a long tract of Land and Sea, elevated so, that it reacheth to the globe of the Moon.

Barc. converted by Masius.

And Moses Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quoque responsum volumus, Paradisum multo sublimiore positum esse regione, atque hæc nostra extet terra, eòque fieri ut illinc per præcipitium delabantur fluvii tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eòque impetu impulsi pressique sub Oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rursus profiliant ebullientque in hoc à nobis culto orbe: which have this sence: Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region far raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to pass, that from thence these Rivers fall down with such a head-long violence, as words cannot express; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried under the deep Ocean Sea, and do again rise and boyl up in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this: Ephram dicit, Paradisum ambire terram, atque ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet Regione, non aliter atque Lunæ orbis Lunam cingit; (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean, as it environeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moon doth embrace the Moon. To the end therefore that these ridiculous Expositions and Opinions do not bring question unto Truth it self, or make the same subject to doubts or disputes, it is necessary to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Navel of this our World, and (as Melanchon says) in parte Terræ meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Center, the Universal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better judge of the beginning of Nations, and of the Worlds inhabitation: for near unto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the Flood, into all other remote Regions and Countreys. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their own fore-fathers have come, and out of what Regions and Nations; it cannot be displeasing to understand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the streams and branches of Mankind have followed and been deduced. If then it do appear by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several Opinions before remembred, by the Truth it self; and to see how they agree with the sence of the Scripture, and with common Reason; and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightful Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

And first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chysamensis, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can find any mark or memory thereof (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountains, which are found on all the Earth over, with many other strange effects:) for mine own opinion, I think neither the one, nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and grown old, in respect of the first beauty (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed:) yet if there had been no sign of any such place, or if the soil and seat had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850 years after the Flood, have described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses, would not have made so often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it self were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Rivers still remain the same Rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit, Tygris, and Euphrates, we are sure to find in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning out one of these Rivers, which afterward doth divide it self into four branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it self.

For it is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into four heads; Now, whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it self, or to Paradise; yet the division, and branching of those Rivers, must be in the North, or South side of the very Garden (if the Rivers run as they do, North and South) and therefore these Rivers yet remaining, and Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the Flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered, as future ages knew it not, so is there no probability that either these Rivers were turned out of their courses, or new Rivers created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills, or deep Valleys. For what descent of waters could there be in a Spherical and round body, wherein there is nor high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of wind, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the Ebb or Flood of the Sea. But that there was any wind (whereby the Seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a wind to pass upon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, untill the waters sank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodness, caused the wind to blow, to dry up the abundant slime and mud of the Earth, and make the Land more firm, and to cleanse the Air of thick vapours, and unwholsome mists: and this we know by experience, that all downright rains do evermore differ the violence of outragious winds, and beat down, and level the swelling and mountainous billows of the Sea: for any Ebbs and Floods there could be none, when the waters were equal, and of one height over all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bays, or Gulfs to receive a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round form of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the Waters rather stood in a quiet calm; than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. And for a more direct proof that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Josephus avoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seen in his days; which pillars were set up above 1426 years before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the Erection of them; and Joseph himself to have lived some forty or fifty years after Christ: of whom, although there be no cause to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seen. Now, that such pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquity hath avowed. It is also written that Berosus (to whom, although I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the City of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus was not defaced by length of time: yea, the ruines thereof, Annius (who commented upon that invented fragment) saith, were to be seen in his days, who lived in the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this City of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cujus maximæ & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge mass is now to be seen, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in these things) that the City of Joppa was built before the Flood, over which Cepha was King: whose name, with his Brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religions, was found graven upon certain Altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruines of this other City, called Enoch by Annius, might be seen, though founded in the first age: but it could not be of the first City of the world, built by Cain; the place rather than the time denying it.

Gen. 2. 10.

And to prove directly that the Flood was not the cause of mountains, but that there were mountains from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of Gen. 4. 17. the Flood overflowed by fifteen Cubits the highest Mountains. And Masius Damascenus, speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Minyadam excelsus Mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confugientes multos, sermo est, Diluvii tempore liberatos. And upon Minyada there is an high Mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which it is said, that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now, though it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saved than eight persons (which Masius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such Mountains were before the Flood, which were afterward, and ever since, known by the same names; and on which Mountains it is generally received, that the Ark rested: but untruly, as I shall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was known before the Flood; on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saved themselves also; but, as Annius saith, without all Authority, either divine or humane.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not so turn upside down the face of the earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that when Noah sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive leaf in her mouth, Gen. 8. 11. which she had pluckt, and which (until the Trees were discovered) she found not: for otherwise she might have found them floting on the water; a manifest proof, that the Trees were not torn up by the roots, nor swam upon the waters, for it is written: folium, Olivæ raptum, or decerptum, a leaf pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seen to succeeding Ages, especially unto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and unto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discovery.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought: making the Ocean to be the fountain of those four Rivers.

THis conceit of Aug. Chysamensis being answered, who onely giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembred, this Universality will appear altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, Fill the Earth, and subdue it, Rule over every Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, And hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, do no way prove such a generality: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now, although all men were of one and the same fountain of blood originally; and Adam's Posterity inhabited in process of time over all the face of the Earth: yet it disproveth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dress and cultive, in which he lived in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had been left to the Universal; Moses would not then have said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath not East nor West but respectively. And to what end had the Angel of God been set to keep the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adam's expulsion, if the Universal had been Paradise? for then must Adam have been chased also out of the World. For if all the Earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should believe with Metrodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirm, That in so large a field, as the Universal, there should grow but one Thistle. Noviomagus upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three Rivers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates, (which water three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountain, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden. Gen. 1. 28. Acts 17. 26. Gen. 2. 8. Gen. 3. 24.

And it is true, that those four Rivers, being so understood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appear, that Pison was falsly taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsly for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Havila in India, and Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and and the mistakings of Noviomagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture far more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius, That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Calvary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the Flood, yet Adam's shin-bones must have contained a thousand fathome, and much more, if he had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the Air.

THirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the School-men affirm, Paradise to be a place altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephus conceived, that Paradise was far in the East, but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and near the Orbe of the Moon (which opinion, though the School-men charge Beda withall, yet Pererius lays it off from Beda, upon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geography of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but finds it seated next or nearest Heaven; It may seem, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) took this place for Heaven it self, into which the Souls of the blessed were carried after death.

Diog. Laert. Soc. True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for fear of the Areopagites (in this, and many other divine apprehensions) set down what they believed in plain terms, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one onely powerful God; and therefore did the Devil himself do him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Justine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgment of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestial Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightful, and healthful, upon the top of Mount Athos (called Acrothonos) which being above all Clouds of Rain, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their so many years) are called Macrobici (that is) Long-liv'd. A further Argument is used, for proof of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the Flood: approved by Isidore and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed Souls were preserved till the last Judgment: which Irenæus and Justin Martyr also believe. But this opinion was of all Catholick Divines reproved, and in the Florentine Council damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this Judgment: Sicut certum est, Enoch & Eliam, nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt, an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certain that Enoch and Elias do now live; so where they live, in Paradise, or else where, it is uncertain. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the four Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean, and afterward have forced their passage through the Earth, and have risen again in the far distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

Just. Mart. adm. ad Gent. Aug.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: (for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferiour to that of the Inventer.)

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so near the Moon, it had been too near the Sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joynct a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the Air in that Region is so violently removed, and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the space between the Earth and the Moon (according to Ptolomy and Alfraganus) is seventeen times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compass of the whole Earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men, seeing it would deprive us of the Sun's light all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell near those falls of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like those that dwell near the Catadupæ, or over-fals of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have seen in the Indies, far greater water-fals, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling near them are not deaf at all. Tostatus (better to strengthen himself) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hæc apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis, quæ nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things either in Basil or Ambrose. Cicero Somn. Sci.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his Wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestial Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith Saint Paul) but all shall be changed: which change in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Flood all perished on the Earth, saving eight persons; and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be. 1 Cor. 15. 36. 51. 1 Pet. 3. 20.

For Tostatus his own opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised above the middle Region of the Air, and twenty cubits above all Mountains, that the Flood did not therefore reach it (which Scotus and other latter School-men also believed; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to over-whelm it:) this is also contrary to the expres letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth us, that the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we as well give credit to Masius Damascenus, and the Thalmudists, who affirm, that there were of the Gyants that saved themselves on the Mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus being (as the rest of the School-men are) full of distinction, saith; That Gen. 7. 19.

the Waters ſtood at Paradiſe, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the Flood was not natural, ſo was Paradiſe ſaved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this ſuppoſition. That it was not believed, that Paradiſe was ſo ſeated as Beda and others ſeem to affirm in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty ſo reſembled. But this I dare avow of all thoſe School-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their followers to ſhift, than to reſolve, by their diſtinctions. Wherefore not to ſtay long in anſwering this opinion of Toſtatus, I confeſs that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Athos, and Atlas, overreach and ſurmount all Winds and Clouds, and that (notwithſtanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both Springs and Fruits; and the Pagan Prieſts, ſacrificing on theſe Mountain-tops, do not find the Aſhes (remaining of their ſacrifices) blown thence, nor thence waſht off by Rains, when they return: yet experience hath reſolved us, that theſe reports are fabulous; and Pliny himſelf (who was not ſparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of theſe Mountains is far under the ſuppoſed place of Paradiſe; and on theſe ſelf Hills the Air is ſo thin (ſaith S. Auguſtine, whom herein I miſtruſt) that it is not ſufficient to bear up the Body of a Bird, having therein no feeling of her Wings, for any ſenſible reſiſtance of Air to mount her ſelf by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that ſeat Paradiſe under the Æquinoctial: and of the pleaſant habitation under thoſe Climates.

THoſe which come nearer unto reaſon find Paradiſe under the Æquinoctial Line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus; judging, that thereunder might be found moſt pleaſure, and the greateſt fertility of Soil: but againſt it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the diſtemperate heat, which he ſuppoſeth to be in all places ſo directly under the Sun; but this is (non cauſa pro cauſa) for although Paradiſe could not be under the Line, becauſe Eden is far from it, in which Paradiſe was; and becauſe there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges under it, (Ganges being one of the four Rivers, as they ſuppoſe) yet this conceit of diſtemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, conſidering the age when thoſe Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every Country, as it lay by degrees nearer the Tropick, and ſo toward the Æquinoctial, did ſo much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reaſonable conjecture, that thoſe Countries which were ſituated directly under it, were of a diſtemper uninhabitable: but it ſeemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and ſo did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in thoſe days it might be thought a fantaſtical opinion (as all are which go againſt the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beauty, and delight, that Paradiſe had, the ſame muſt be found within that ſuppoſed uninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neareſt to the Line it ſelf. For hereof Experience hath informed reaſon, and Time hath made thoſe things apparent, which were hidden, and could not by any contemplation be diſcovered. Indeed it hath ſo pleaſed God to provide for all living Creatures, wherewith he hath filled the World, that ſuch inconveniences which we contemplate a far off, are found by trial and the witneſs of Mens travels, to be ſo qualified, as there is no portion of the Earth made in vain, or as a fruitleſs lump to faſhion out the reſt. For God himſelf (ſaith Iſaiah) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we find that theſe hotteſt Regions of the World ſeated under the Æquinoctial Line, or near it, are ſo refreſhed with a daily gale of Eaſterly Wind (which the Spaniards call the Brize, that doth evermore blow ſtrongeſt in the heat of the day, as the down-right Beams of the Sun cannot ſo much maſter it, that there is any inconvenience or diſtemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are ſo cold, freſh and equal, by reaſon of the entire interpoſition of the Earth, as (for thoſe places which my ſelf have ſeen, near the Line and under it) I know no other part of the World of better, or equal temper, only there are ſome tracts, which by accident of high Mountains are barr'd from this Air and freſh wind, and ſome few ſandy parts without Trees, which are not therefore ſo well inhabited as the reſt; and ſuch difference of Soils we find alſo in all other parts of the World. But (for the greateſt part) thoſe Regions have ſo many goodly Rivers, Fountains and little Brooks, abundance of high Cedars, and other ſtately Trees caſting ſhade, ſo many ſorts of delicate Fruits, ever bearing, and at all times beautified with Bloſſom and Fruit, both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be beſt compared to the Paradiſe of Eden: the Boughs and Branches are never unclothed and left naked, their Sap creepeth not under Ground into the Root, fearing the injury of the froſt: neither doth Pomona at any times deſpiſe her wichered Huſband Vertumnus, in his Winter quarters and old age. Therefore are theſe Countries called Terræ vitioſæ, Vitious Countries: for nature being liberal to all without labour, neceſſity impoſing no induſtry or travel, idleneſs bringeth forth no other Fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleaſures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and thoſe of his opinion were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who miſliked this opinion, and followed a worſe. And (to ſay the truth) all the School-men were groſs in this particular.

Iſai. 45. 18.

Of the change of the names of places: and that beſides that Eden in Cœleſyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Iſaiah 37. and Ezek. 27.

THeſe opinions anſwered, and the Region of Eden not found in any of thoſe imaginary Worlds, nor under Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we diſcover and find out the ſeat thereof, for in it was Paradiſe by God planted. The difficulty of which ſearch reſteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations have often changed names with their Maſters; ſo are moſt of theſe places, by Moſes remembred, forgotten by thoſe names of all Hiſtorians and Geographers as well Ancient as Modern.

Beſides, we find that the Aſſyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Perſians, (Cyrus only and few other excepted) ſought to extinguiſh the Hebrews. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans deſpiſed once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as thoſe three Monarchies ſucceeded each other: ſo did they transform the names of all thoſe principal places and Cities in the Eaſt: and after them, the Turk hath ſought (what he could) to extinguiſh in all things, the ancient memory of thoſe people; which he hath ſubjected and inthralled.

Now beſides thoſe notable marks, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides theſe two conſiderations (to wit) That it lay Eaſtward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judæa Eastward was Arabia Petræa; but in this Region was Moses himself when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden, neither have any of the Arabians any such Rivers, as are expresst to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petræa, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility, and the Rivers only described, we must seek it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isaiah I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabshakeh. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them, which my Fathers have destroyed, as Gosan and Haran and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar? and in Ezekiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were thy Merchants, &c.

Isaiah 37. v. 12.

Cap. 27. vers. 23.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapolitan: the second part is that Valley called Avenis, otherwise Convallis, or the Tract of Chamath, where Assyria is joyned to Arabia the Desart, and where Ptolomy placeth the City of Averia: and the third is known by the name of Domus Edenis, or Cœlesyria, otherwise Vallis cava, or the hollow Valley, because the Mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coele in Greek is Cava in Latin. But this is not that Eden, which we seek: neither doth this Province lie East from Canaan, but North, and so joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, because there is a little City therein called Paradise, the Jews believed this Cœlesyria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise: though to give Beroaldus his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, saving, that he failed in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether misunderstood two of the four Rivers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appear hereafter. Now to find out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth us) lay Eastward from the Deserts, where he wrote after he had passed the red Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isaiah and Ezekiel joyneth with it. For (saith Isaiah) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezekiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (saith Ezekiel) the Mart of the people for many Ilses. And it hath ever been the custom, that the Persians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities upon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterran Sea: as in ancient times to the City of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issicus, now Laiazzo. Ezekiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Mart-town of that part of the World, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what Commodities every Country yielded: and having counted the several People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercited. They were thy Merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in raiments of blue silk, and of broidered work, fine linen, coral and pearl: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and in what kinds they traded, he hath these words. The Merchants of Sheba and Raamah were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy fairs, with the chief of all spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yield: and because Sheba and Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulf, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gumms, and Pearls, as their own Countries yielded, and (withal) having trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of Spices, and plenty of Gold. The better to convey these Commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Sabeans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the City of Terredon (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence sent up all these rich Merchandises by Boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three days journey of Aleppo, and then over Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezekiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited far up the River, and received this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper Commodities which themselves had, and which they received out of Persia, which bordered them. S. Hierome understandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is seated upon Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads, and which took that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent City. Hierosolymitanus thinks it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated down low upon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I mean on the East-side of Tigris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Pliny placeth the Schenite upon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Desart, and where the River of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desart of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenitæ) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their own City of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the City of Thapsacus, where Ptolomy appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenita by Strabo, whose words are these; Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam euntibus iter est per Schenitas. The Merchants which travel from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran do much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not upon Euphrates it self, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezekiel (as) they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad were thy Merchants. Wherefore Charran which is sometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the Region of Mesopotamia: or Aran fluviorum, the Greek word (Mesopotamia) importing a Country between tween Rivers: for Meſos in Greek, is medius in Latin, and Potames, fluvius. And when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it ſelf, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforeſaid.) For Strabo in the deſcription of Arabia giveth that tract of Land from the borders of Cœloſyria, to the edge of Meſopotamia, to the Scbenitæ, who alſo inhabited on both ſides of Euphrates; and were in after-Ages accounted of theſe Arabians which inhabit Batanea, and the North part of the Deſarts, ſtretching themſelves toward the inhabited ſolitude of Palmirena, which lieth between Syria, and Arabia the Deſart. So as theſe of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran, and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witneſs Appian) and ſo Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries upon Geneſis; the name by time and mixture of Languages being changed from Chalne, or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, ſtanding in Triangle with Seleucia, and almoſt the next unto it (as) Thelbe-Canne, and Man-Canne, the one a little to the Weſt of Seleucia, and the other oppoſite unto it; where theſe Rivers of Tygris and Euphrates are ready to joyn. Therefore, which of theſe the ancient Canne was (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain ſeat thereof, that ſo many other Cities did retain a part of the name in ſo many Ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that theſe additions of Thelbe and Man to the word Canne, were but to make difference between the Eaſt and the Weſt, or the greater and the leſs Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to diſtinguiſh Cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other City joyned with Eden, as Haran, or Charran, Saint Hierome on the Judges ſpeaketh thereof in theſe words: Cumque reverterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, quæ eſt in medio itinere contra Niniven, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran (which is the mid-way againſt Nineveh) the eleventh day. Judg. 1.

This City is by the Martyr Stephen, named Charran (ſpeaking to the High-Prieſt:) Ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: the God of glory appeared to our Father Abraham, while he was in Meſopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the ſeat of this City is not doubted of; for it is not only remembred in many Scriptures, but exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Craſſus the Roman, who for his unſatiable greedineſs, was called Gurges avaritiæ; the Gulf of Avarice. Whereof Lucan: Acts 7. 2.

With Roman blood th'Aſſyrian Carre he defil'd.

But this City Canne, or Chalne, is made manifeſt by Moſes himſelf, where it is written of Nimrod: And the beginning of his Kingdoms was Babel, and Erech, and Acad, and Chaln, in the Land of Sinaar, or Shinar: where Moſes ſheweth the firſt compoſition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were ſubject unto Nimrod; all which lay in the ſaid Valley of Shinar, or near it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which alſo Eden ſtretcheth it ſelf, Chaldæa, Babylonia, Sinar, idem ſunt (ſaith Comeſtor.) Three names of one Countrey: Which Region of Babylonia, took name of the Tower Babel; and the Tower of the confuſion of Tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh Chapter of Geneſis, in theſe words: And as they went from the Eaſt, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Plain Babylon was built (as aforeſaid.) Gen. 20. 10. Verſe 2.

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the firſt beginning of Nimrod's greatneſs, and before he had ſubdued any ſtrange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and alſo named by Moſes to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which alſo Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that thoſe of Eden were alſo the Merchants which traded with the Tyrians: and Iſaiah in the threats of Senacherib againſt Jeruſalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Father had deſtroyed) nameth the Children of Eden which were at Telaſſar. But before I conclude where Eden it ſelf lyeth, it is neceſſary to deſcribe thoſe other Countreys which Ezechiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembred, as, thoſe of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Geneſis the tenth: Moreover the Sons of Ham were Cuſh, &c. And the Sons of Cuſh were Seba, and Havila, and Sabtah, and Raamah, &c. And the Sons of Raamah were Sheba, &c. And anon after, Cuſh begat Nimrod: ſo as Sheba was the grand-child of Cuſh, and Nimrod the Son of Cuſh, whoſe elder brother was Sebah: though ſome there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and underſtanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part in Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma took that part adjoyning to Shinar, toward the Sea ſide and Perſian Gulf (called afterwards Raama and Sheba, by the Father, and his Sons, which poſſeſſed it.) For (ſaith Ezechiel) the Merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy Merchants, they occupied in thy fairs with the chief of all Spices and all precious Stones, and Gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Countrey, which parteth Arabia Deſerta from Arabia Fœlix, and which joyneth to the Sea, where Tygris and Euphrates fall out, and render themſelves to the Ocean. This part and confining Country, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the beſt Myrrhe and Frankincenſe is gathered: which People have an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the Eaſt-ſide of the Perſian Gulf. By this it appears who were the Shebeans, ſpoken of by Ezechiel, and ſaid to have been the Merchants of Tyre, for Gold, Spices, and precious Stones: of which they had not only plenty of their own, but were alſo furniſhed from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities. For, as Strabo reporteth out of Eraſtothenes, In Perſicæ oræ initio Inſula eſt, in qua multi & pretioſi uniones gignantur: in aliis verò, clari & perlucidi lapilli. Eraſtothenes (ſaith Strabo) affirmeth, that, In the beginning of the Perſian Gulf, there is an Iſland, in which there are many precious Pearls bred: and in other very clear and ſhining Stones. Now, the difference between Sheba the Son of Raamah, and Seba the Son of Cuſh, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Sameeh;) and Sheba with (Schin:) but whatſoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countreys and Habitations are diverſe. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Perſian Sea, and Saba (whence the Queen of Saba) neighboured the Red-Sea; and ſo that place of the 72 Pſalm expounded Reges Arabum & Sabæ, hath in the Hebrew this ſence, Reges Shebæ & Sabæ. Strabo l. 16. Verſe 7.

The Shebans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, becauſe they inhabited upon the Out-let of the ſame River, upon which the Edenites were ſeated: and ſo thoſe of Sheba, towards the Sea-coaſt and upon it, paſt up the Countrey, by Tygris and Euphrates, being being joyned in one main ſtream, and ſo through the Region of Eden, which Tygris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their merchandiſe toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Channeh, border Eden on the Weſt and North-weſt: ſo doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-eaſt: Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphraſt: which Countrey, by the Geographers is called Coromiteua, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews alſo often uſe.

Thus much of thoſe Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edenites, inhabiting Telaſſar: for theſe Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had deſtroyed; and this place of Telaſſar lay moſt convenient, both to receive the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and alſo to convey it over into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now, to make theſe things the more plain, we muſt remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death theſe Monarchies were utterly diſ-joyned.

For it appeareth both in Eſay the 37. and in the ſecond of Kings, by the threats of Rabſache, the while the Army of Aſſyria lay before Jeruſalem, that the Cities of Goſan, Haran, Reſeph, and the Edenites at Telaſſar, had reſiſted the Aſſyrians: though by them (in a ſort) maſtered and recovered. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have deſtroyed as Goſan, and Haran, Reſeph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telaſſar? But it appeared manifeſtly after Senacherib's death, that theſe Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others ſubjection: for Eſar-Haddon held Aſſyria; and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabſache which lay before Jeruſalem (Hezekias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angel of God deſtroyed; the King of Babel ſent to Hezekias, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Aſſyrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himſelf was ſlain by his own ſons in the Temple of his Idols, Eſar-Haddon ſucceeding him in Aſſyria. To the Babylonian Ambaſſadours ſent by Merodach, Hezekias ſhewed all his Treaſures as well proper as conſecrate, which invited the Kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conqueſt and ſubverſion. So as, the ſuſpition of war encreaſing between Babylon and Aſſyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Aſſyria, were employed to bear off the incurſions of the Aſſyrians; and their Garriſon-place was at Telaſſar: and the very word (Telaſſar) ſaith Junius, ſignifying as much as a Bulwork againſt the Aſſyrians. This place Hieroſolomitanus takes for Reſem, others for Seleucia: but this Telaſſar is the ſame, which Am. Marcellinus in the Hiſtory of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Perſia) calleth Thilutha in ſtead of Telaſſar, who deſcribeth the exceeding ſtrength thereof in his 24. Book: It is ſeated in an Iſland of Euphrates upon a ſteep and unaſſaultable Rock, in ſo much as the Emperour Julian durſt not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garriſon againſt the Aſſyrians, being alſo a paſſage out of Meſopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Country adjoyning were lodged to defend the ſame. This place Ptolemy calleth Teridata, having Reſeph (which he calleth Reſepha) on the left hand; and Canneh, (which he calleth Thelbe-Canne) on the right hand; not far from whence, is alſo found the City of Maun-Canne, upon Tygris; and all theſe ſeated together, as Eſay and Ezechiel have ſorted them. But the underſtanding of theſe places is the more difficult, becauſe Aſſyria (which the Chaldeans call Atturia,) and Meſopotamia, were ſo often confounded; the one taken for the other by interchanging of Dominion. Aſſyria & Meſopotamia in Babylonia nomen tranſierunt (ſaith Niger) Aſſyria and Meſopotamia took the name of Babylonia. Laſtly, It appeareth by thoſe adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is ſeated, as, by Charran or Haran in Meſopotamia: alſo by Canneh and Reſeph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in theſe words tranſlateth this place: Plantaverat autem JEHOVAH Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente; The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden Eaſtward: that is (ſaith he in his Annotations) Juſſerat naſci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabiæ & Meſopotamiæ; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eaſtern Region in the borders of Arabia and Meſopotamia.

§. X.

Of divers other teſtimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradiſe.

AND for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it ſeems by the two Epiſtles of the Neſtorian Chriſtians, that inhabit Meſopotamia: which Epiſtles in the yeat 1552. they ſent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andræas Maſius hath publiſhed them, tranſlated out of Syriac into Latin. By theſe Epiſtles (I ſay) it ſeems we may have ſome farther light for the proof of that, which we have ſaid about the Region of Eden in thoſe parts. For in them both, there is mention of the Iſland of Eden in the River Tygris, or at leaſt, Tygris in both theſe Epiſtles is called the River of Eden. This Iſland, as Maſius in his Preface to theſe Epiſtles ſaith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, The Iſland, by an eminency.) It hath (ſaith he) ten miles in circuit, and was ſometimes walled round about, which name of the Iſland Eden may (doubtleſs) remain to this day; though in the reſt of the Region ſo called, this name be ſwallowed up with the fame of thoſe flouriſhing Kingdoms of Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Iſland of Eden hath up the River, and not far beyond it, the City of Haſan-Cepha, otherwiſe Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Moſal or Moſel, from which (as in that which followeth it ſhall appear out of Maſius) it is not above twelve miles diſtant. Neither is it to trouble us, That Moſal or Moſel by Marinus Niger is remembred among the Cities higher up Tygris, in theſe words, Juxta autem Tygrim, Civitates ſunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quæ nunc Moſel dicitur; magna ſanè, &c. (that is) By Tygris are theſe Cities, Dorbeta near unto mount Taurus (which is now called Moſel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, diſplacing Moſel, and making it to be Dorbeta, (I ſay) needs not here to trouble us: ſeeing for this matter, the teſtimony of Maſius, informed by the Chriſtians that dwelt there (the Seat of whoſe Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Moſal (or Mozal) is in the Confines of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria, ſeated upon Tygris, and in the neighbour-hood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Neſtorian Chriſtians in their former Epiſtle, call it Attur in theſe words: Ex omnibus civitatibus & pagis quæ ſunt cum Civitatem Moſel (hoc eſt) Attur, in vicinia Nineves; Of all the Cities and Towns which are about the City of Moſal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Nineve. As alſo Niger acknowledgeth Cteſiphon a City thereabout to be called Aſſur, (which is the ſame as Attur, after the Dialect of thoſe Nations, which change Sh. into T.) Neither is it much that he ſhould miſtake Cteſiphon, (which is not far off Selencia) for Seleucia, to be Aſſur. By this then we may come ſomewhat near the end of our purpoſe. For the Iſle of Eden, which lieth in the breaſt of ut ſupra.

Tygris,

Tygris, is but twelve miles from Mosul and that antient City, which Ptolemy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineve; Philostratus, and Simeon Sethi, Mosola, and John Leon, Musal, others Mosse, (though it be not the same with Mosul) is set but a little higher upon the same River of Tygris, near Mosul: so that we are like to find this Isle of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it above Mosal, makes it to be below Hasan-Cepha, which is upon the same River of Tygris.

The only difficulty is this, that some perhaps may think, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speak not of any Isle in Tygris, called the Isle of Eden, but of an Isle in Tygris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more unprobable. And yet, if this were the meaning here, we have a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not only Euphrates, but also Tygris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath been subject to the same change, that all other Kingdoms of the world have been, and hath by conquest and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth over Euphrates, was after the Floud called Shinar, and then, of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia, and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which imbraceth both the banks of Tygris between Mount Taurus, and Sekunia. And of this Region of Eden that antient Æthicus maketh mention, (not that latter Æthicus, Disciple of Gallinicus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenæus called Istri, who lived in Egypt in the Reign of Philadelphus, but another of a far higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of the Greek by Saint Hierom. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written, in Æthicus, Adonis for Edenim yet Adonis being a River of Phœnicia, cannot be understood to be the Region named by Æthicus. For Æthicus makes it a Country, and not a River, and joyneth it with Mesopotamia and Æthiopia, calling the land of Chus Æthiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And Lastly, the River which watereth the Regions (saith Æthicus) falleth into the Gulf of Persia: which River he called Armodius for Tygris; Tygris being but a name imposed for the swiftness thereof. And out of Armenia, both Tygris and Euphrates have their original: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traverse Mesopotamia, Regions first of all known by the name of Eden, for their beauty and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fertility thereof in divers places is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaves are always green, and therefore therein a perpetual Spring. Also Stephanus, de Urbibus, mentioneth the City of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in use in Amos's time, though he spake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Cœlo-Syria. But to the end I may not burthen the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tygris (once joyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those four heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were divided: whose courses being known, Eden (out of which they are said to come) cannot be unkown. Now that Hiddekel and Perath, were Tygris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seventy and all others convert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel, Tygrim omnes exponunt; And all men understand Hiddekel by Tygris (saith Vatablus. And because that which I have said of the Isle of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of self-invention, I have here under set down the words out of the two general Epistles of the Nestorians, as Masius (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, That the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in Queen Marys time they had) fifteen Churches in one City called Seleucia Parthorum, or Mosel upon the River of Tygris; having no sufficient authority to choose themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three Metropolitan Bishops at the least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtain allowance unto such an Election, as themselves had made: having three hundred years before that, upon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made known to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for, upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous desire to enrich himself, had forborn to institute Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-government. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred years had been of one House and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stock and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignity which his Predecessors had held, the rest of the professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choice of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the general Epistle to the Pope are these, about the middle of the said Epistle; Verùm nos non acceptavimus, neq; proclamavimus ipsum; sed subitò convenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & Pagis quæ sunt circum civitatem Mosel (hoc est, Assur) in vicini à Nineves, ex Babylonia, ex Charra, ex Arbela, ex Insulâ quæ est in medio Tygris, fluminis Eden, &c. i. e. But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Assur) neighbouring upon Nineve; and out of Babylon, Carrha, Arbela; and out of the Island which lyeth in the middle of Tygris, a River, of Eden, or rather out of the Isle of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tygris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they used these words: Neq; superstes apud nos Metropolitæ, quorum est ordinare Catholicum; sed soli pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasti, Episcopus Adurbeigan; ex è vestigio convenimus in Insulam, quæ est intra Tygrim flumen, Eden; fecimusq; compactum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordain a Patriarch, but only a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmastis, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we assembled speedily in the Island of Eden, which is in Tygris, and agreed between our selves, &c.

Now this Island of Eden, Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the four sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which he calleth Nestorians, Jacobites, Maronites, and Copbti, he goeth on in these words: Mox, audita illius morte, convenisse aiebant tumultuariò in illam quam modò dixi Tygris Insulam, quæ duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem fere millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undiq; cincta, & à paucis aliis quam

Christi-

Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarck, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Island of Tygris or Eden before spoken of, which Island is situated about twelve miles above Mosal, containing very neer ten miles in compass, and every where inuironed with a wall, inhabited by few other men then Christians. And afterward, he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest he addeth the Isle of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tygris, sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the City of Hosan-Cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra praedictam Tygris Insulam, rupi asperae impositam; Above the aforesaid Island of Tygris, being seated on a steep Rock. Of this Island of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Book of his general Cosmography, in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la Rivere du Tygre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l' Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tygris, the soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the antient name of Eden liveth; and that of Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petraea, and the Desart where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Carras according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and joyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria, and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garrisoned to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above written;) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tygris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the known Rivers of those four, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficulty in the Text, which seemeth to make the four Rivers to rise from one stream.

BUT it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plural: which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith he, hath these words: Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Quae verba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & ejusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur; Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene (hoc est) fluvii procedebant ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into four heads; Which words (saith Beroaldus) do better agree with the natration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated; And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became four heads. The Tygurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus, Et fluvius egrediebatur de deliciis: And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightful and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the Country of Eden, and not to the Garden it self.

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is usual among the Hebrews: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herb that seedeth Seed, the fruitful Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew useth the Singular for the Plural, Herb and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and again, We eat of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In media ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (Trees.) And of this opinion is David Kimchi and Eutablus, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrews do often put the Singular for the Plural, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum; and he giveth an instance in this question it self, as, A River (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, be given to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the four heads, to be four notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (River) Verse the Tenth for one River, (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to have been) divides it self, and ere long yieldeth four notable passages into several Countries, though not all the way down stream (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the River downward, there is conveyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria) were up Tygris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the River of Eden, doth not say, it compasseth or washeth the whole Region of Assyria (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth towards Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-malcha (by interpretation) Basilius, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tygris under Apamia; whence riseth the name of Pasi-Tygris, as it were Piso-Tygris. This leadeth to the Land of Havila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabarsares or Narragas; for Nahar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen derivatum (a River derived,) also Acracanus, quasi Ranosus, by reason of the Froggie Fens which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper stream of Pison, or Basilius, which runneth into Hiddekel, properly so called (that is, into Tygris) above Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage up Tygris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel or Tygris, having before no known proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being of the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Ortis. But be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tygris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not far from these Rivers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plain it is that Hiddekel is Tygris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses Eastward towards Assur, as we find, that Tygris is the River of Assyria propriè dicta, whose chief City was Nineveh, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Nineveh, which was the chief City of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of four heads; though the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountains, yet here are they to be understood, to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the first stream. Caput aquae (saith (saith Ulpianus) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; sic ex fonte nascetur fons; ex flumine, vel ex lacu prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the Water be out of a Fountain, then is the Fountain taken for the Head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a main River any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth first bound it self with new Banks, there is that part of the River, where the branch forsaketh the main Stream, called the Head of the River.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian Soil, as it is certain that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertility and beauty, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertility and pleasure, that it had before the Curse; neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same vertue to any Plant thereon growing, that they had before the Flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Country, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I find written of it: First in Herodotus, who was an eye-witness, and speaketh of the very place it self, for the Isle of Eden is but twelve Miles or thereabout from Niniveh, and so from Mosul. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod Urbs Ninus sita erat, Hæc regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated; This Region, of all that we have seen, is most excellent. And he addeth afterward, Cereris autem fructu procreando adeò ferax est, ut nunquàm non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth Corn, that it yieldeth two hundred fold: the Leaves of Wheat and Barley being almost four fingers broad: As for the height of Millet and Sesam, they are even in length like unto Trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speak hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seem very incredible to those, which never were in the Country of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Country Palm-trees growing of their own accord, the most of them bearing Fruit; out of which they make both Meats, and Wine, and Hony, ordering them as the Fig-trees. Thus far Herodotus.

Herod. Clia. l. 1.

To this Palm-tree, so much admired in the East-India, Strabo and Niger add a fourth excellency, which is, that it yieldeth Bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; of which these People make Bread, Wine, Hony, and Vineger. But Antonius the Eremite findeth a fifth Commodity, not inferior to any of those four, which is, that from this self-same Tree there is drawn a kind of fine Flax, of which People make their Garments, and with which in East-India they prepare the Cordage for their Ships; and that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the Eremite confesseth, saying, That he received a Garment made thereof from the Eremite himself, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East-Indies so highly esteem and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yieldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith Strabo) passim per omnem regionem Palmæ sua sponte nascentes. There are of Palms over all the whole Region, growing of their own accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report, Euntibus à parte læva, Arabia odorum fertilitate nobilis, regio campestris interest inter Tigrim & Euphratem, jacens tam ubere & pingui solo, ut à pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat, (that is) As you travel on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet Odors) there lieth a Champain Country placed between Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitful and fat a Soil, that they are said to drive their Cattel from the Pasture, lest they should perish by satiety. Bis in anno segetes Babylonis secant. The Babylonians cut their Corn twice a year (saith Niger). And as Countries generally are more fruitful to the Southward, than in the Northern parts: so we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of Armenia, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his words be these in the Latin, Tota enim hæc regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemque semper virentibus: This Region aboundeth with pleasant Fruits, and Trees always green: which witnesseth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Suns neighbourhood, the life and stirrer up of nature in a perpetual activity. In brief so great is the fertility of the Ground, that the People are constrained twice to mow down their Corn-fields, and a third time to eat them up with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty years, could not make out kind of Wheat bear Seed, but it grew up as high as the Trees, and was fruitless. Besides, those Fields are altogether without Weeds (saith Pliny) who addeth this singularity to that Soil, That the second year the very Stubble (or rather falling down of the Seeds again) yieldeth them a harvest of Corn without any further labour: his words are these, Ubertatis tantæ sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restibilis fiat seges.

Plin. nat. hist. l. 18. c. 17.

§. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the Land of Havilah.

AFter the discovery of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertility thereof, it resteth to prove that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris, and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certainty of these two Rivers should trouble so many wise Men, it is strange to me, seeing necessity it self (Tigris and Euphrates being known) findeth them out: for Euphrates or Tigris, or both be that River or Rivers of Eden, which water Paradise, which River or Rivers Moses witnesseth afterward; divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancy in the World, than when we find both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seek the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Rivers as far distant, as any of same known or discovered in the World: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Rivers were divided into four branches; and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason and Experience bearing witness. There is no error, which hath not some slippery and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability resembling truth, which when Men (who study to be singular) find out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the World matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformity of Mens minds to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their help to nurse and cherish such weak Babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But

But this mistaking (and first for the River of Pison) seemeth to have grown out of the not distinguishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah, which adjoineth to Babylonia, afterward known by the name of Susiana. For Havilah upon Tigris took name from Havilah the Son of Cush; and Havilah in India from Havilah the Son of Joctan, the one remembred by Moses in the
Gen. 10. 7. discription of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth down the generation of Noah and his Sons after the Flood. For the Sons of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, and Raamah; and the Sons of Joctan were Ophir, and Havilah, &c. of which later (to wit) of Ophir and Havilah the Sons of
10. 29. Joctan, that Island of Ophir, (whence Salomon had Gold) and Havilah adjoyning had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous River of the East India, and Havilah a Country of the same, and is situated upon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was the taken for Pison, which River
2. 11. is said by Moses to water the Land of Havilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those four Rivers, named by Moses, must of necessity be four of the greatest in the World; whence (supposing that Ganges was next great and famous River after Tigris and Euphrates, they chose out this River to make one of the four. And yet certainly there is another River, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges; for the River Indus on this side India, for beauty, for nearness, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges; but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable Man conceive, that Ganges can be one of the four heads: seeing Indus cometh between it and Tigris; and between Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdoms. And agin, farther toward the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie between those two proud Rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the four, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much less Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little less than forty degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely whosoever readeth the Story of Alexander shall find, that there is no River in Asia, that can exceed Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himself and the greatest part of his Army, and in sailing down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deep, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed up therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great as it, having beside this, the Rivers of Coas, of Suastus, Acesines, Adris, (otherwise Hirotis) Hispalis, and Zaradrus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed up with all their Children and Companions, which being all incorporate and made one Stream, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaia visiteth the Ocean Sea.

Gen. 2. 15. But because Pison, which compasseth Havilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must somewhere be joyned with the rest in one body, or at least be found to proceed out of the same Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads do proceed, out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riseth in the uttermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterranean Sea; and the River Ganges riseth out of the Mountain Imaus, or (as others will have it) Caucasus, which divides the Northern Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, near Georgiana or Iberia, the other not far off in the same Armenia, by the Gordizan Mountains, so as Ganges who only travelleth in her own India, and Nilus through Aethiopia and Aegypt, never saw the Land of Eden, or joyned themselves in one Chanuel, either with themselves, or with either of the other, and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or divided into four heads or branches, according to Moses.

Therefore the River Pison, which enricheth Havilah, is the same which by joyning it self with Tigris, was therefore called Piso-tigris, or Piso-tigris of Pison and Tigris, which River watereth that Havilah, which Havilah the Son of Cush gave Gen. 2. name unto, and not Havilah of India, so called of v. 12. Havilah the Son of Joctan, who inhabited with his Brother Ophir in the East. And this Havilah of the Cushites hath also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx Stone. This Bdellium is a Tree of the bigness of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yieldeth a certain gumm, sweet to smel to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrews take the Load-stone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew signifieth Pearl: so doth Eugubinus; and Hierome calls it Oleaster; be it what it will, a Tree bearing Gumm, or Pearl: Havilah, or Susiana, hath plenty of both. Now this Country of Susiana or Havilah stretcheth it self toward the North, as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all that Tract of Land Southward, as far as the Persian Gulf, on the East-side thereof; from which East-side had the Sabeans (which traded with the City of Tyre, according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of Gold; which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

The Greeks had a conceit, that Pison was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-Ezra (saith Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia translateth Pison into Nilus. But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellespont and all Asia the less, between it and Tigris. Now Pison which runneth through Havilah or Susiana, doth to this day retain some sign of this name; for where it and Tygris embrace each other under the City of Apamia, there do they agree of a joint and compounded name, and are called Piso-tigris. And it is strange unto me, that from so great Antiquity there should be found remaining any resembling sound of the first name: for Babylon it self, which dwelleth so near these Rivers, is by some Writers known by the name of Bandas, as, by Postellus, by Castaldus, of Baldach: by Barius, of Bagdad; and of Bonghedor, by Andrew Theuet; and yet all those that have lately seen it, call it Bagdet. To this River of Pison, Ptolomy indeed, with many others, give the name of Basilius, or Regius; and Gehon they term Mabarsares and Marsias, and Baarsares. So is Euphrates, near the Spring and Fountain, by Strabo and Pliny called Pixirates: by Junius, Puckperath, out of the Hebrew, (that is) The profusion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrews Parath, (saith Ar. Montanus:) Pagninus, Perath: Josephus, Phorah: Eusebius, Zozimus: Ammianus, Chalymicus: Giftilanus and Colinutius term it Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Assyrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nahor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as, Diglito, and Diglath, Seilax, and Sollax: of the Hebrews it was called Hiddikel: now of the Inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer upon Genesis conceiveth rightly of these Rivers: for Euphrates and Tigris (saith he) stream into four branches, two of which keep their ancient names, and the other two are called Pison and Gehon. The reason why these two Rivers joyned in one (below Apamia) lose their names, and are called Pisi-tigris, and the memory of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the Channel of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldæa, not far from Ur, the City of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pison doth.

This error, that Pison was Ganges, was first broached by Josephus, (whose Fields though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of Weeds) and other Men (who take his authority to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pison was transported into the East India, to find out Havilah: so was Gehon drawn into Africa, to compass Æthiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adjoyning to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsly interpreted Æthiopia) fastened to it on the other side, we shall not need then to work wonders (that is) to impose upon Men the transportation of Rivers, from one end of the World to the other, which (among other uses) were made to transport Men. Now it was in the valley of Shinar, where Cush the Son of Ham first sate down with his Sons, Sheba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the Son of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pison compasseth; and the Land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, took name of Cush himself. For as the Sons of Joctan, Ophir, and Havilah, seated themselves as near together as they could in India, so did the Sons of Cush in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah or Chavilah was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana.

From this Havilah unto the Desarts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalekites posses all the interjacent Countries: for Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah to Sur: which Sur the Chaldaan Paraphrast converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea; but this was not meant from Sur upon the red Sea, to Havilah in the East India; for Saul was no such Traveller or Conqueror, and therefore Havilah must be found nearer home, where the Sons of Ismael inhabited, and which Country Saul wasted: for Amalek and the Amalekites possest that neck of Country, between the Persian Sea, and the red Sea; Havilah being the extreme of the one towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Ægypt and the West, leaving that great body of Arabia Fœlix towards the South; and they spred themselves with the Madianites and Edumæans, from the East part, or back-side of the Holy Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best parts of Arabia Petræa, and Deserta.

§. XIV.

Of the River Gehon and the Land of Cush: and of the ill translating of the Æthiopia for Cush. 2 Chron. 21. 16.

NOW, as Havilah in the East India drew Pison so far out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seventy translated Æthiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Æthiopia by the Greeks, whom the Latins followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But Æthiopians are, as much, as black or burnt Faces, whose proper Country is called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Ægypt. And although there be many other Regions of Æthiopians, and far South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembred in the Ægyptian Stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Ægypt: all which Æthiopians are very near, or else directly under the Æquinoctial line, which is very far from that Land inhabited by the Chusites; who are neither black of colour, nor in any sort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this Translation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner. There are (saith he) two Æthiopia's, the East, and the West: and this division he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chush Æthiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chush and the Land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Æthiopia. See more of this point, c. 7. §. 10.

Now if it be granted, that Cush and the Land of the Chusites, be that Tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitavit Ismael ab Havilah usque Sur, qua respicit Ægyptum introeuntibus Assyrios: Ismael dwelt from Havilah unto Sur, that is towards Ægypt, as thou goest toward Assyria; The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture Habitavit Ismael, &c. hath this sense. Ismael dwelt from Havilah, which is the way of Assyria, or the Country bordering Assyria; and Sur, which lieth toward Ægypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelve Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions between the border of Ægypt and Assyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zerah the Chusite, which others call Tharamba, brought an Army of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Juda. Which Army came not out of Æthiopia beyond Ægypt; for that had been a strange progress for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, having so mighty a King as the King of Ægypt, between Palastina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalekites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Army, he in following his victory took some of the Cities of King Zerah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a City of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the words of the Scripture disproving it: And Abraham departed thence toward the South Country, and dwelt between Cadesh and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar; Now Sur is that part, upon which Moses and the Israelites first set their Feet after they passed the red Sea, where the Amalekites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had been weary, and unable to resist. Again, in the Story of Isaac it is written, Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech

Gen. 25. 18. Vers. 18. 2 Chron. 14. 9. Gen. 16. v. 11. Exod. 17. 8.

Gen. 26. 1. melech, and the Philistims unto Gerar: and I am sure Abimelech and the Philistims were no Æthiopians.
10. 19. And lastly, Moses himself, where he describeth the Bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: for Sydon was the Frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Pererius doth with an honest excuse salve his Translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint, and Josephus did altogether misunderstand this place. And first, for Homer's East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elsewhere. For Pliny in his fifth Book and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Author, of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, under Prester John; And the West Æthiopia is that, which joyneth it self with the River Niger, which we call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Æthiopians, called Perorsi, Daratites, with divers other names, which Pliny numbreth. But all these are in Africa, and beyond
Plin. l. 5. c. 8. the Desarts thereof, saith Pliny out of Homer, Agrippa, and Juba, which Regions indeed (I mean that of Niger, and that of Prester John, and the Troglodites) lie due East and West. But as for Cush, and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Ægypt. Now, that Josephus was exceeding gross herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which he hath of Moses when he served Pharao, in the Wars against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia,) he transporteth Madian by miracle over the Red Sea, and beyond all Ægypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall be shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek copy, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of
C. 2. v. 18. the Prophet Hieremie. And what hast thou now to do in the way of Ægypt, to drink the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Ægypti, ut bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith Pererius, profectò Hebraicè ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, quæ significat nigrum & turbidum; Truly (saith Pererius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which signifieth black and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and unanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses
Exod. 2. 21. 3. 1. married the Daughter of Jethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greek and Latin call a Madianite, and not Æthiopissam, as (with Josephus) the Geneva converts it, though it help it a little Numb. 12. 1. with a marginal note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Country of Madian, which is that part of Arabia Petræa, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus, that Moses fled from Pharao, into the land of Madian,
V. 15. and sate down by a Well, &c. and again, in the third
V. 1. of Exodus; When Moses kept the sheep of Jethro his Father-in-law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeed, these four Nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one general word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. 37. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Joseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Joseph to Potiphar, Pharao's Steward. The Genevians, in a marginal note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who took the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any Mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, and so in this very place it appeareth by their Merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Joseph: for their Camels were loaden with Spicery, and Balm, and Myrrh, which are the trades of Arabia Gen. 37. 20.
Fœlix, from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is served with Myrrh and Frankincense; and their Spices they received from the East side of the Arabian Gulf, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chapter it is said: That Potiphar V. 1. bought Joseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldaan Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the 6. of Judges. That when Israel had sown, then came up the Madianites, and the Amalekites, V. 3.
and they of the East, and came upon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desart; so as where before in the buying of Joseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites, are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the story of Gedeon, the Madianites only are named, as comprehending C. 7.
both Nations; and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that every Man would give him the golden Ear-rings, which they had taken, after the Victory against Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700 Sheckles of Gold, it is written: For they had golden ear-rings, because they were C. 8. v. 24.
Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and Gen. 16. 12.
valiant Nation, and ever in action of War. Manus ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of Ismael) shall be against all Men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers think Mahomet to be of the Schenita. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Josephus) use Poison upon their Arrows, as the Indians do. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites; and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill Translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is, among other places, made most apparent, in the 2. Chron. 21. 16.
second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the Spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; so Hierome reads it; the Geneva Translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now, how far it is off between the Philistines, and the Negro's or the Æthiopians, every Man that looketh in a Map, may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians, do mix and joyn with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirty, or three and thirty Degrees, and therefore not their next Neighbours; but all Ægypt, and the Desarts of Sur, and Pharan, are between them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should have been translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against Jehoram, the Spirits of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, who indeed are their next Neighbours.
* Nulla superest dubitatio, quin Æthiopia in sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt * Steuch. Eugub. in Gen. c. 2.
(saith Steuchius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Country, which joyneth to Arabia.

Now may we think it is probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living Man so well, and therefore would would never have named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely if Moſes had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would have called the River (into which he was caſt upon Reeds, and preſerved by God, working compaſſion in the Daughter of Pharao) a River of Ægypt, wherein he was born and bred, and wrought ſo many Miracles. Beſides the River of Nilus is often named in the Sciptures, but never by the name of Gehon. And if Moſes had told the Iſraelites, that Nilus had been a River of Paradiſe, they might juſtly have thought that he had derided them: for they had lived there all the days of their lives, and found no ſuch Paradiſe at all, nor any memory, or ſpeech thereof; except we ſhall believe the Paradiſe of Heſperides, where (ſaith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wild Olives inſtead of Golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Eſay, and once in the Prophet Hieremie; and yet in thoſe places it is not ſaid to be a River of Æthiopia, but of Ægypt. For in a word, the Iſraelites had never any communion or affairs with the Æthiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Ægypt, to the South; but the enemies, which they had on the South, and Eaſt parts, were theſe Nations of the Chuſites, Philiſtines, Iſmaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often governed by many little Kings, or Reguli, were diſtinguiſhed in names, according to the Fathers and Heads of thoſe Nations; but in one general name were all Arabians. On the North ſide of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Caleſyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themſelves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the ſtrongeſt Cities upon the Sea-coaſt (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Hieruſalem it ſelf was with-held from Iſrael (from the days of Moſes even unto the time of David) by the Jebuſites.

Plin. l. 5. c. 1.

Iſa. 23. v. 3.

Jer. 2. v. 18.

That which now remaineth of moſt difficulty is, that it doth not appear, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the ſtony, which the Chuſites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Iſrael: and in this Deſart it was that Mart. Beroaldus loſt himſelf in ſeeking out Paradiſe: for he was driven (to my underſtanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gehon, and Piſon; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah, for I find none ſuch in Rerum natura, as he hath deſcribed: by which Rivers he alſo includeth within Paradiſe, even Arabia the Deſart.

And as he well proved that Piſon was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus: ſo where to find them elſe-where it ſeemeth he knew not. Certainly this River of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whoſe ſprings he findeth far Eaſt in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a ſmall ſtream, riſing between it and the red Sea, whoſe head from Gaza it ſelf is little more than twenty Engliſh Miles, as ſhall appear hereafter. But queſtionleſs, hence it comes that many were miſtaken. They all conſidered of the habitations of the Chuſites, as they were planted when the ſtate of Iſrael ſtood, and when it flouriſhed, being then their near Neighbours, and never looked back to the firſt ſeats and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children never reſted, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and near which himſelf with his Sons firſt inhabited. Havilah took the River-ſide of Tigris chiefly on the Eaſt, which after his own name he called Havilah, (now Suſiana:) Raamah and Sheba farther down the River, in the entrance of Arabia Fœlix. Nimrod ſeated himſelf in the beſt of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himſelf and his Brother Mizraim firſt kept upon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldea, and in proceſs of time, and as their People increaſed, they drew themſelves more Weſterly towards the red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim paſt over into Ægypt, in which Tract the Chuſites remained for many years after. Now becauſe there could be no ſuch River found in Arabia the ſtony, which they might entitle Gehon, they tranſlated Chus Æthiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if we do examine this miſtaking by example, we ſhall the better perceive it as it was. For let us ſuppoſe that Brute, or whoſoever elſe that firſt peopled this Iſland, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and calling the Iſland after his name Britannia, it might be ſaid that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in proceſs of time, the ſame Brute had alſo diſcovered and conquered Scotland, which he alſo entituled by the ſame name of Britannia, after-ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, becauſe the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us ſuppoſe that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phœnicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the firſt diſcoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of ſome River in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he firſt diſcovered, ſhall we in like ſort reſolve, that France, Spain, and Italy, &c. are no parts of Europe, becauſe that River is not found in them, or any of them? In like manner was it ſaid by Moſes in his deſcription of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which the Chuſites ſhould or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabit, ſeeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) have been Maſters in time, (as the Saracens which came of them were) of a great part of the World. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which took beginning in Nimrod the Son of Chus, conſiſted at the firſt but of four Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne, yet we find, that his Succeſſors within a few years after commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel conſumed the memory of Chuſea. For of this Tower of Confuſion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatneſs of that Empire founded by Nimrod a younger Son, obſcured the name and Nation of his Father Cuſh in thoſe parts, until they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chuſites retained their names, which alſo they faſtned to the Soil and Territory by themſelves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not think that Chus or any of his could in haſt creep through thoſe deſert Regions, which the length of 130 years after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted every Buſh and Briar, Reed and Tree to joyn themſelves (as it were) into one main Body and Foreſt. For if we look with judgment and reaſon into the Worlds plantation, we ſhall find, that every Family ſeated themſelves as near together as poſſible they could; and though neceſſity enforced them, after they grew full of People, to ſpread themſelves, and creep out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times reſort, and ſuccour one another by River, the Fields being then (without all doubt) impaſſable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and ſtrength uſurped dominion over the reſt, ſate down in the very confluence of all thoſe Rivers, which watered Paradiſe: for thither it was to which the greateſt Troops of Noah's Children repaired, and from the ſame place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increaſe. The Firſt Father of men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The ſecond Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his diſperſion.

Now as Nimrod the youngeſt, yet ſtrongeſt, made his choice of Babel (as aforeſaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleanſed and enriched; ſo did Havilah place himſelf upon Piſo-tigris: Raamah and his Son Sheba farther down upon the ſame River, on the Sea-coaſt of Arabia: Chus himſelf upon Gehon, the faireſt branch of Euphrates. And when they began to ſpread themſelves farther off, yet they always faſtened themſelves to the Rivers ſides: for Ninive, Charran, Reſeph, Canneh, Ur in Chaldaa, and the other firſt-peopled Cities were all founded upon theſe navigable Rivers, or their branches, by which the one might give ſuccour and aſſiſtance to the other, as is already often remembred.

§. XV.

A Concluſion by way of repetition of ſome things ſpoken of before.

BUT now to conclude this diſpute, it appeareth to me by the teſtimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradiſe was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, ſeated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterwards called Aram fluviorum, or Meſopotamia, which taketh into it alſo a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region ſtanding in the moſt excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35 Degrees from the Æquinoctial, and 55 from the North Pole: in which Climate the moſt excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyl, Grain of all ſorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this ſaid Soil and temper, than the abundant growing of the Palm-trees, without the care and labour of Man. For wherein ſoever the Earth, Nature, and the Sun can moſt vaunt, that they have excelled, yet ſhall this Plant be the greateſt wonder of all their works: this Tree alone giveth unto Man whatſoever his Life beggeth at Natures hand. And though it may be ſaid, that theſe Trees are found both in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies, which Countries are alſo bleſſed with a perpetual Spring and Summer, yet lay down by thoſe pleaſures and benefits the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous Diſeaſes, the multitude of venemous Beaſts and Worms, with other inconveniences, and then there will be found no compariſon between the one and the other.

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradiſe had, before God, (for mans ingratitude and cruelty) curſed the Earth, we cannot judge; but I may ſafely think that by how much Adam exceeded all living Men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanſhip of God, by ſo much did that choſen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the univerſal World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees, of Life, of Knowledge, Plants only proper, and becoming the Paradiſe, and Garden of ſo great a Lord.

The ſumm of all this is, That whereas the eyes of Men in this Scripture have been dim-ſighted (ſome of them finding Paradiſe beyond our known World: ſome, above the middle Region of the Air: ſome, elevated near the Moon: others, as far South as the Line, or as far North, as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the Reader will be ſufficiently ſatisfied, that theſe were but like Caſtles in the Air, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eaſtward in Eden (ſaith Moſes) Eaſtward, in reſpect of Judea, that God planted this Garden, which Eden we find in the Prophets where it was; and whereof the name (in ſome part) remaineth to this day. A River went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence divided it ſelf into four branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates ſwimming through Eden do joyn in one, and afterward taking ways apart do water Chus and Havilah, according to Moſes: the true ſeats of Chus and his Sons then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Piſon was Ganges, the Scripture, Reaſon, and Experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joyned cannot be divided. Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Rivers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the ſame diſtance maketh the ſame impoſſibility, and this River is a greater ſtranger to Tigris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for although there are between Tigris and Ganges above four thouſand Miles, yet they both riſe in the ſame quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the mountains of the Moon, almoſt as far off as the Cape of Good Hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates diſtilleth out of the Mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulf of Perſia: the one riſeth in the South, and travaileth North: the other riſeth in the North, and runneth South, threeſcore and three Degrees the one from the other. In this leaf following I have added a Chorographical Deſcription of this terreſtrial Paradiſe, that the Reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Diſcourſe; and this is the reward I look for, that my labours may but receive ſo much allowance ſuſpended, until ſuch time as this deſcription of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the Tree of Life was a material Tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden Fruit, is made subject to Death.

FOR eating the forbidden Fruit of the Tree of Knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradise, in exilium vitæ temporalis, into the banishment of temporal life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were material Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospel) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fix them, and so slippery, as nothing can fasten them, have in this also delivered to the World an imaginary Doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrews) hath a plural construction, and is to be understood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of Lives, because the Fruit thereof had a property, to preserve both the growing, sensitive, and rational life of Man; and not only (but for Adam's transgression) had prolonged his own days, but also given a dureful continuance to all Posterity; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last. Bart. Sept. in l. 1. 174.

And although it is hard to think, that flesh and blood could be immortal, but that it must once perish and rot, by the unchanged Law of God imposed on his Creatures, Man (notwithstanding) should have enjoyed thereby a long, healthful, and ungrieved life: after which (according to the opinion of most Divines) he should have been translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Flood, the days of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and soon after, the Flood of two hundred years and upwards even to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed God's first and easie Commandment, the lives of Men on earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first Age, as many learned Men have conceived. Chrysostom, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of belief, that (but for Adam's Fall and transgression) Adam and his Posterity had been immortal. But such is the infinite wisdom of God, as he foresaw that the Earth could not have contained mankind; or else, that Millions of Souls must have been ungenerated, and have had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for ever: and therefore that of Chrysostom must be understood of immortality of Bodies, which should have been translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many have conceived, that the same was not material, but a mere Allegory, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisdom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will give to him that overcometh, to eat of the Tree of Life, which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place St. Augustin's answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestrial Paradise, so there was a celestial. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to think that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were mere foolishness. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the Earth every Tree fair to sight, and sweet to taste; the tree also of life in the midst of the garden: which sheweth, that among the Trees, which the Earth by Gods commandment produced, the Tree of Life was one, and that the Fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ovid, and others steal the invention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise, they took the Plat-form of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar, and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortality; and therefore said to be the meat and drink of the Gods. Apocal. 2. 7.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

NOw for the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, some Men have presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himself the honour to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever guess at, whereat Goropius much marvaileth. But as he had an inventive brain, so there never lived any Man, that believed better thereof, and of himself. Surely howsoever his opinion may be valued, yet he usurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the invention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Bar-Cephas fastened on this conjecture above six hundred years before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephas himself referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius useth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other Men to that belief. For Moses Bar-Cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 49.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, the Indian Fig-tree, of which the greatest plenty (saith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Acesines, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies in, or near the Kingdom of Porus.

This Tree beareth a Fruit of the bigness of a great Pease, or (as Pliny, reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a Tree se semper serens, always planting it self; that it spreadeth it self so far abroad, as that a Troop of Horsemen may hide themselves under it. Strabo saith, that it hath Branches bending downwards, and Leaves no less than a Shield. Aristobulus affirmeth that fifty Horsemen may shadow themselves under one of these Trees. Onesicritus raiseth this number to four hundred. This Tree Plin. l. 12. c. 5. Lib. 15. cap. 2.

(ſaith Theophraſtus) exceedeth all other in bigneſs, which alſo Pliny and Oneſicritus confirm: to the trunk of which theſe Authors give ſuch a magnitude as I ſhame to repeat. But it may be, they all ſpeak by an ill-underſtood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not ſo rare a Plant, as Becanus conceiveth, who becauſe he found it no where elſe, would needs draw the Garden of Paradiſe to the Tree, and ſet it by the River Aceſines. But many parts of the World have them, and I my ſelf have ſeen twenty thouſand of them in one Valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moiſt Grounds, and in this manner. After they are firſt ſhot up ſome twenty or thirty foot in length, (ſome more, ſome leſs, according to the Soil) they ſpread a very large top, having no Bough nor Twig in the trunk or ſtemm: for from the utmoſt end of the head-branches there iſſueth out a gummy juyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or ſinew, and within a few Months reacheth the ground; which it no ſooner toucheth but it taketh Root, and then being filled both from the top-boughs, and from his own proper Root, this cord maketh it ſelf a Tree exceeding haſtily. From the utmoſt Boughs of theſe young Trees there fall again the like cords, which in one Year and leſs (in that World of a perpetual Spring) become alſo Trees of the bigneſs of the nether part of a Launce, and as ſtraight as Art or Nature can make any thing, caſting ſuch a ſhade, and making ſuch a kind of Grove, as no other Tree in the World can do. Now one of theſe Trees conſidered with all his young ones may (indeed) ſhroud four hundred or four thouſand Horſemen, if they pleaſe; for they cover whole Vallies of ground where theſe Trees grow near the Sea-bank, as they do by thouſands in the inner part of Trinidado. The cords which fall down over the Banks into the Sea, ſhooting alway downward to find root under water, are in thoſe Seas of the Indies, where Oyſters breed, intangled in their beds, ſo as by pulling up one of theſe cords out of the Sea, I have ſeen five hundred Oyſters hanging in a heap thereon; whereof the report came, that Oyſters grew on Trees in India. But that they bear any ſuch huge Leaves, or any ſuch delicate Fruit, I could never find, and yet I have travailed a dozen miles, together under them. But to return to Geropius Becanus. This Tree (ſaith he) was good for meat and pleaſing to the ſight, as the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil is deſcribed to be.

Secondly, this Tree having ſo huge a trunk (as the former Authors report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themſelves from the preſence of God, for no other Tree (ſaith he) could contain them. But firſt it is certain, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or ſtemm, for among ten thouſand of them it is hard to find any one bigger than the reſt, and theſe are all but of a mean ſize. Secondly, the words of Moſes tranſlated in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters underſtood in the plural number, (that is) in the midſt of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moſes Bar-Cephas, word for word) is, that when Adam and Eve found themſelves naked, they made them Breeches of Fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the Tree it ſelf was a Fig-Tree, or that a Fig-Tree grew near it: becauſe Adam being poſſeſt with ſhame, did not run up and down the Garden to ſeek out Leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it ſelf; and theſe Leaves of all other were moſt commodious, by reaſon of their largeneſs, which Pliny avoweth in theſe words; Latitudo foliorum Pelta effigiem Amazonia habet, The breadth of the Leaves hath the ſhape of an Amazonian Shield: which alſo Theophraſt confirmeth; the form of which Targets Virgil touches:

The Amazons with Creſcent-formed Shield
Pentheſilea leads into the Field.

Here Becanus deſireth to be believed, or rather threatneth us all that read him, to give credit to this his borrowed diſcovery, uſing this confident (or rather cholerick) ſpeech. Quis erit tam impudenter obſtinatus, ſi hæc à nobis de ſicu hac ex antiquis ſcriptoribus cum Moſis narratione comperta, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inveniri poſſe, quæ cum illa magis quadret: Who will be ſo impudently obſtinate, if he compare theſe things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of Moſes, as to dare to avow, that any other Tree can be found, which doth more properly anſwer, or agree therewith. But for my ſelf, becauſe I neither find this Tree, ſorting in body, in largeneſs of Leaves, nor in Fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth never brought forth any of theſe Trees neither before nor after; but I leave every man to his own belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kind: only thereby, and by the eaſie Commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon, it pleaſed God to make trial of his Obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quàm ad commendandum puræ ac ſimplicis Obedientiæ bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other reſpect, than thereby to commend the goodneſs of pure and ſimple Obedience. Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, l. 13. c. 20.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not unwitty allegorizing of the Story of his Ficus Indica.

BUT in this I muſt do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his ſuppoſition of the Tree it ſelf to be true. The effects whereof, becauſe his Diſcourſes are exceeding ample, I have gathered in theſe few words. As this Tree (ſaith he) ſo did Man, grow ſtraight and upright towards God, until ſuch time as he had tranſgreſſed and broken the Commandment of his Creator; and then like unto the boughs of this Tree, he began to bend downward, and ſtooped toward the Earth, which all the reſt of Adam's Poſterity after him have done, rooting themſelves therein, and faſtening themſelves to this corrupt World. The exceeding umbragiouſneſs of this Tree he compareth to the dark and ſhadowed life of Man, through which the Sun of Juſtice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the ſhadow of death, till it pleaſed Chriſt to climb the Tree of the Croſs for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among ſo many large Leaves, may be compared (ſaith he) to the little Vertue, and unperceived Knowledge among ſo large Vanities, which obſcure and ſhadow it over. And as this Fruit is exceeding ſweet, and delicate to the taſte and palate; ſo are the delights and pleaſures of the World, moſt pleaſing while they dure. But as all thoſe things which are moſt melliſluous, are ſooneſt changed into choler and bitterneſs: ſo are our vanities and pleaſures converted into the biteereſt ſorrows and repentances. That the Leaves are ſo exceeding large, the Fruit (for ſuch Leaves) exceeding little; in this, by compariſon we behold (ſaith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly Men, their ſollicitude, their outward ſhews, and publick oſtentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we ſeek for the Fruit, which ought to be their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bigneſs of the ſmalleſt Peaſe; glory, to all the World apparent; goodneſs, to all the World inviſible. And furthermore, as the Leaves, Body, and Boughs of this Tree, by ſo much exceed all other Plants, as the greateſt Men of Power and worldly ability ſurpaſs the meaneſt: ſo is the little Fruit of ſuch Men, and ſuch Trees, rather fitting and becoming the unworthieſt Shrub, and humbleſt Bryar, or the pooreſt and baſeſt Man, than ſuch a flouriſhing ſtatelineſs and magnitude. Laſtly, whereas Adam, after he had diſobeyed God, and beheld his own nakedneſs and ſhame, ſought for Leaves to cover himſelf withal, this may ſerve to put us in mind of his and our ſins, as often as we put on our Garments, to cover and adorn our rotten and mortal Bodies: to pamper and maintain which we uſe ſo many uncharitable and cruel practices in this World.

§. IV.

Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil: with ſome other notes touching the Story of Adam's ſin.

NOW, as touching the ſenſe of this Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, and what operation the Fruit thereof had, and as touching the property of the Tree it ſelf, Moſes Bar-Cephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (tranſlated by Maſius) giveth this judgment, That the Fruit of this Tree had no ſuch vertue or quality, as that by the taſting thereof, there was any ſuch knowledge created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Junius alſo noteth, Arbor ſcientiæ boni & mali (id eſt) experientiæ boni & mali ab eventu, The Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil (that is) the experience of Good and Evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew Phraſe) by the Workmanſhip of Gods own Hand, in greater perfection than ever any Man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whoſe ſeed all Men living have grown up; and having received immortality from the Breath or Spirit of God, he could not (for theſe reſpects) be ignorant, that the diſobeying of Gods Commandment was the fearfulleſt evil, and the obſervation of his Precepts the happieſt good. But as Men in perfect health do (notwithſtanding) conceive, that ſickneſs is grievous, and yet in no ſuch degree of torment, as by the ſuffering and experience in themſelves they afterwards witneſs: ſo was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the puniſhments, due to neglect and diſobedience; and yet felt by the proof thereof in himſelf another terror than he had forethought, or could imagine. For looking into the Glaſs of his own guilty Soul, he beheld therein the horror of Gods Judgments, ſo as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had trial of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchaſed evil, which could not be expreſt. He then ſaw himſelf naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods Grace and former Felicity: and therefore was this Tree called the Tree of Knowledge, and not becauſe the Fruit thereof had any ſuch operation, by any ſelf-quality or effect: for the ſame Phraſe is uſed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signs and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In ſuch ſort as this Tree was called the Tree of Knowledge, becauſe of the event (as is aforeſaid) ſo was the Well of Contention therefore called Eſek, and the Well of Hatred Sitnath, becauſe the Herdſmen of Iſaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heap of Stones, called the Heap of Witneſs, between Jacob and Laban, not that the Stones bare witneſs, but for a memory of the Covenant. So Jacob called the Houſe of God Bethel: and Hagar, the Well in the Deſart, Vivemis & videntis. Num. 24. 13. Gen. 26. 20, 21. c. 31. 48. c. 28. 19. c. 16. 14.

But Adam being both betrayed and maſtered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himſelf, and looking but ſlightly (as all his iſſues do) into the miſeries and ſorrows incident, and greatly affecting the ſuppoſed glory which he might obtain by taſting the Fruit forbidden, he was tranſported and blown forward by the gentle wind of pleaſing perſwaſions unawares; his progreſſion being ſtrengthened by the ſubtile arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poyſon Mankind in the very root, which he moiſtened with the liquor of the ſame ambition, by which himſelf periſhed for ever.

But what means did the Devil find out, or what inſtruments did his own ſubtlety preſent him, as fitteſt and apteſt to work this miſchief by? even the unquiet vanity of the Woman; ſo as by Adam's hearkening to the voice of his Wife, contrary to the expreſs commandment of the living God, Mankind by that her incantation became the ſubject of labour, ſorrow, and death: the Woman being given to Man for a comforter and companion, but not for a Counſellor. But becauſe thou haſt obeyed the voice of thy Wife, &c. (ſaid God himſelf) Curſed is the earth for thy ſake, in ſorrow ſhalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is alſo to be noted, by whom the Woman was tempted; even by the moſt ugly and unworthy of all Beaſts, into whom the Devil entred and perſwaded. Bart. ſem. 2. l. 2. Gen. 3. 17.

Secondly, What was the motive of her diſobedience: even a deſire to know what was moſt unfitting her knowledge, an affection which hath ever ſince remained in all the poſterity of her Sex. Thirdly, what was it that moved the Man to yield to her perſwaſions? even the ſame cauſe which hath moved all Men ſince to the like conſent, namely an unwillingneſs to grieve her and make her ſad, leſt ſhe ſhould pine and be overcome with ſorrow. But if Adam in the ſtate of perfection, and Salomon the Son of David, Gods choſen Servant, and himſelf a Man endued with the greateſt Wiſdom, did both of them diſobey their Creator, by the perſwaſion and for the love they bare to a Woman, it is not ſo wonderful as lamentable, that other Men in ſucceeding ages have been allured to ſo many inconvenient and wicked practices by the perſwaſions of their Wives, or other beloved Darlings, who cover over and ſhadow many malicious purpoſes with a counterfeit paſſion of diſſimulate ſorrow and unquietneſs.

§. I.

Of the cauſe and the revenge of Cain's ſin: and of his going out from God.

THE ſame pride and ambition which began in Angels, and afterward poſſeſt Adam, Cain alſo inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptation of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) ſlew him, making himſelf the firſt Man-ſlayer, and his Brother the firſt Martyr: the revenge of which unnatural Murther, although it pleaſed God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his Puniſhment was greater than he could bear. For the ſame offence chiefly (wherewith the Sons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he deſtroyed all mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The earth alſo was corrupt before God: of which in the ſame place Moſes giveth a reaſon, for ſaith he, The earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after God himſelf made the cauſe known unto Noah, ſaying, An end of all fleſh is come before me, for the earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will deſtroy them with the earth, or from the earth: Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in taking away the lives of Men only, but in all ſorts of injuſtice and oppreſſion. After this murther of Abel, Cain went out from the preſence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, towards the eaſt-ſide of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the preſence of the Lord, is not to be underſtood after the literal ſenſe; God being wholly in all parts of the World. Totus in cœlo, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, ſed utrumque ſimul. God (ſaith S. Auguſtine) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by interchanged times, but all at once; and that this is true, David witneſſeth. If I be in heaven (ſaith David) thou art there, if in hell, thou art there alſo: but what is meant thereby? Exiit à facie Dei (ſaith Chryſoſtom) Cain went out from the preſence of the Lord, (that is) he was left of God, diſfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

§. II.

Of Cain's dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

THIS word Nod or Naid S. Hierome and many others underſtand to ſignifie wandring, or incertain habitation: vexation or agitation, ſaith Junius; but the Seventy convert it otherwiſe, and take Nod for the proper name of a Country, and ſo doth Joſephus. But it ſeemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or wanderer in his Cogitations, than any thing elſe, and that his Thoughts and Conſcience had no quiet or reſt, in regard of the murther committed, juſtly fearing (by his own words) the like violence: And whoſoever findeth me (ſaith Cain) ſhall ſlay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling ſignifieth an abiding: and we call thoſe People Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling-place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifeſt, Moſes teacheth in what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the Eaſt ſide of Eden. Secondly, it is ſaid by Moſes, that after Cain departed from the preſence or favour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his firſt-born, Enoch; which ſheweth that he feared to wander, and rather ſought to fortifie himſelf againſt revenge. Cyrillus ſaith, that Cain and Abel were Figures of Chriſt and of the Jews; and that as Cain, after that he had ſlain Abel unjuſtly, had thenceforth no certain abiding in the World: ſo the Jews, after they had Crucified the Son of God, became Runnegates: and it is true, that the Jews had never ſince any certain Eſtate, Commonweal, or Prince of their own upon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Junius taketh to be in Arabia Deſerta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Deſert is not Eaſtward, or on the Eaſt part of Eden, neither are theſe Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all theſe, in what part of the World ſoever, which in old time lived by Paſtorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) upon White-meat without Tilling of the Ground, are called by the Greeks Nomades, and by the Latins Paſtores vagi, as the Northern Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britains, and the Northern Iriſh: yea ſuch were the Inhabitants of Italy it ſelf, till ſuch time as Italus (who gave them that Name) taught them the Husbandry of Tillage uſed at this day. But the Region Eaſtward from Eden is that part of Aſſyria, called by Ptolomie, Calena, which alſo might be derived of Carena, the Country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in thoſe parts it may be gathered by the firſt poſſeſſion of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Gen. 3. Therefore the Lord God ſent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the earth whence he was taken: and in the Verſe following: Thus he caſt out man, &c. and at the eaſt-ſide of the garden of Eden he ſet the Cherubins: which ſheweth that the entry into Paradiſe was from the Eaſt, by which entrance Adam was caſt out, and therefore inhabiting on that ſide of Paradiſe which was Eaſtward, according to the Text: Cain alſo in the ſame Region ſought his dwelling-place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid do ſignifie profugus, that is, a Fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, than till he built the City of Enoch, the firſt of the World, which he incloſed either for his own defence, or (as Joſephus writeth) to oppreſs others thereby. So as for mine own opinion I am reſolved with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word [Vagabond] which Cain uſeth of himſelf, it ſeemeth by the cloſe of the ſame Verſe, that [Vagabond] is therein underſtood for ſuch an one as travelleth in fear of revengement: for whoſoever findeth me (ſaith Cain) ſhall ſlay me; or elſe [Vagabond] is taken for a Man without protection, and caſt out from the favour of God.

And becauſe theſe Henochians, ſo called of the City Henoch, were the firſt Society and civil Aſſembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of theſe People (either for cruelty, ſtrength, or other actions) lived in the memory of Noah and his Sons; ſo that that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of Natures, some vertuously, some impiously disposed, and every active mind setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those People, which delighted in Cruelty and Oppression, took on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it self where Henoch stood before the Flood, and whereof the Monuments might remain (as the Pillars or the Foundation of Joppe did) gave occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselves by the same names: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the Borders of Pontus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, and Bactria, and of the same name many Mountains, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged time hath covered over or defaced, we may (according to the counsel of Plato) exceedingly rejoyce, and therewith satisfie our selves, if of so great and almost worn-out Antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names and Nations there remain any print or footsteps to Posterity.

Quotidiè aliquid in hoc magno Orbi mutatur, nova urbium fundamenta jaciuntur, nova Gentium nomina (extinctis nominibus prioribus) oriuntur. Seneca ad Albinam.

In * Pliny, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we find those Henochei described, though diversly written, as in Pliny sometimes Heniochi, in Mela Eniochi, in Flaccus, Heniochi, in Lucan Enochii, all which inhabit upon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the East side of Eden, or (according to Moses's words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometime he useth the word East or South without borrowing, or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleventh he writeth the word [East] simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, but in this of Cain he addeth the word [towards] as, in the Land of Nod towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South, of the East.

V. 2.

But as we may conjecture that these Nations took name of Henoch, the City of Cain, or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was repeopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henochii of Colchis, and other parts adjoyning, were not the first of that name, after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World again: because, had this Henoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then been seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, till he track them or trace them out to their original. For he calleth these of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Heniochi; Ptolomy Zani; beyond which an hundred and fifty Mile Eastward he findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these again he discovereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest took beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the Mountains of Paro-panisus, between them and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochii are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it self.

Plin. l. 6. c. 4. 5. Ptol. tab. Asiæ. 3.

And although we cannot be assured, that these Henochii took name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spred themselves Westward (as all Noahs Sons did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable, than that of Annius the Fryar, who sets Henoch in Phœnicia, quite contrary to Moses's word: Phœnicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And besides these several Nations of the Henochii, Stephanus findeth a Region called Henochia, and the same also in the East, with divers Mountains about Bactria and Sogdiana of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things else) out of the word [Heniochi] which signifieth Carts or Coach-Men, make these Nations to have sprung from the Waggoners of Castor and Pollux (to wit) Amphites and Telchius, who attended them in the enterprise of Jason into Colchis. And though I do not deny, but that Jason with other Greeks ranged the coasts of Asia the less, in an open Boat or kind of small Galley, * of whom I shall speak in his own time: yet no Man doubteth but that the Tale of the Golden Fleece was for the most part Poetical; and withall that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their own Rowers, being four and fifty, there was no place and less use of Coach-Horses or Waggoners.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cain's generation.

BUT of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the City of Henoch in prophane story, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answer some few Objections against certain particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, How it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance than his Son Henoch) to perform such a Work as the Building of a City, seeing there is thereto required so many Hands, and so great a Mass of all Sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious race) Moses useth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his Divine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first Race, which wasted by the least account 1656. Years in five short Chapters. Yet thus much may every Man borrow of his own weakest Reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of Mens Lives, so long a Measure, as 800. and 900. Years, that in such a space Cain had not want of leasure and means to build many such Cities as Henoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World soever: for in what Age of Cain's Life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his Issues Moses had the least care. And as it was said of Cain, that he built a City: so was it said of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World; but in both, the process of time required to be understood: which advice seeing Moses useth where the space less requireth it, as knowing that he writ the Scriptures to reasonable Men, we may easily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like Nature. For in making but a difference between the Birth of Abel, and Oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos, or à fine dierum (that is) in process of time it came to pass that Cain brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be understood of Cain, that many years fore-gone, and when his people were increased he built the City of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he
2 Kings 6. built Enoch, so of Salomon, that he built the Temple of Hierusalem; yet it is well known of Salomon, that he employed in that work 150000. Labourers: for this Phrase or speech is common with our selves to say, The King invaded, when he caused an Invasion to be made: and he built, when he commanded such a Building. And therefore seeing we find, that Moses had no regard to the Ages, to the Birth, or to the Death of any of Cain's Issues, it is not to be marvailed at, why he also passeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this
Gen. 4. 17. manner: Cain also knew his Wife, who conceived and bare Henoch, and he built a City, and called the
18. name of the City after the name of his Son Henoch: And to Henoch was born Irad, and Irad begat Mehuiael, and Mehuiael begat Methusael, and Methusael Lamech.

C. 6. v. 5. Now of Seth, Moses writeth far otherwise, and in this manner. And Seth lived 105. Years, and begat Enoch, and Seth lived after he begat Enoch 807. Years, and begat Sons and Daughters: so as all the days of Seth were 912. Years, and he died: as for the Years and times of the wicked they were not numbred in libro viventium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his Manhood: and therefore this way and work Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing over the reprobate Generation (as aforesaid.) Of the line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

¶ 1. Adam.

2. Cain.	2. Seth.
3. Henoch.	3. Enosh.
4. Irad.	4. Cainan.
5. Mahuiael.	5. Mahaleel.
6. Mathusael.	6. Jarad.
7. Lamech, who by Ada had	7. Henoch.
8. Jubal and Tubal, and by Silla	8. Mathusalem.
Tubalcain, and Noema.	9. Lamech, and 10. Noah.

These be the generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Josephus giveth unto Lamech threescore and seventeen Sons and Daughters, by his two Wives Ada, and Silla: and to these three Sons of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the invention of Pastorage, of Musick, and the working in Metal; for it seemeth that Jubal first gather-
Gen. 4. 20, 21, 22. ed together, and made familiar those Beasts which formerly were untamed, and brought them into Herds and Droves: Tubal invented Musick, and Tubalcain the working in Brass and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanical, the third given to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Shepherds, Handy-crafts men, and Musicians. And in the Issues of Seth began the Services of God, Divinity, Prophecy, and Astronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.

Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second Scruple hath been made, How it came to pass that the Patriarchs begat their Children at so divers ages as Cainan or Canan at seventy Years, Mahaleel and Enoch at threescore and five Years, whereas Jared begat not any of his until he was 162. Years old: Mathusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. Years. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Jared, Mathusalem, or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the religion of abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular sanctities, begat Children before he was threescore and ten Years old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first-begotten and eldest Sons of the Patriarchs; but he drew down the line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors were they elder or younger as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Jarad, nor Lamech the first-born of Mathusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many Sons before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though these three were only named, and surviving, and which by God were reserved to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at threescore and ten Years who was the first Son of Kenan, and then reckon that Mathusalem begat Lamech in the 187. Year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses rejecteth all the other Sons of Mathusalem but Lamech only, because he was the Father of Noah as aforesaid. Of this St. Augustine hath somewhat else in his 20. and 21. Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first age, and so to Abraham, and the Children of the promise after him; so doth St. Matthew recite the Genealogy of Christ, not by the eldest Sons, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-born, who have hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the Evangelist nameth Isaac, Matt. 1. and not Ismael, though Ismael were first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esau the elder; neither is Christ derived from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and so from David a younger Son of Jessai; and lastly we find, that the 1. King.
Kingdom it self of Juda was not given to the Heir in nature, but to the Heir of Grace, namely Salomon.

§. V.

Of the long Lives of the Patriarchs: and some of late memory.

THe third Objection is, that the great difference of Years between those of the first age, whereof some of them had well near seen a thousand Years, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-ages, seeing that soon after the Flood Men lived not a third part of that time, and in succeeding ages and to this day not the tenth.

They

They that have hereon resolved that those Years were but Lunary Years, (to wit) of a Month or thereabouts, or Ægyptian Years, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the Year of his Life 105. if those Years be taken but for Months, then had Seth lived but eight Years and one Month when he begat Enosh: and if the time of Enosh have the same allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time have been but six Years and forty eight weeks old; and so it may be gathered of the rest; excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kind, bearing Fruit and Seed. But this were two ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at 6. 7. or 8. Years, agreeth with the short lives of the Pigmies, and not with the Constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the Workmanship of Gods Hands, and begotten and born in the strong Youth of the World, had length of Days and ability of Body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunary Years, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longest, and upwards of nine hundred Years, had by that account but the time of fourscore and ten and odd Years, which were not only less by far than the Patriarchs lived after the Flood, but short of many Mens lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourscore, and some, a hundred Years. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written Gen. 25. That Abraham died in a good Age, an Old Man, and of great Years; all which (if the former account were of Lunary Years) makes but seventeen and an half of our Years.

And if we seek for a cause of this long Life in Nature, then is it reasonable, that the first Man, created in highest perfection, should also beget Children of equal strength or little differing: for of the first and purest Seed there must of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfullest Plants. Secondly, the Earth it self was then much less corrupt, which yielded her increase, and brought forth Fruit and food for Man, without any such mixture of harmful quality, as since that time the curse of God for the cruelty of Mans Heart brought on it and mankind: Neither had the waters of the Flood infused such an impurity, as thereby the Natural and powerful operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and harmful change. And as all things under the Sun have one time of strength, and another of weakness, a Youth and Beauty, and then Age and Deformity: so time it self (under the deathful shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worn out that lively Vertue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants, yea the Heavens themselves being of a most pure and cleansed matter shall wax old as a Garment; and then much more the Power generative in inferiour Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative Vertue from the superiour. Psalm 102. 26.

But besides the Old Age of the World, how far doth our Education and simplicity of living differ from that old time? the tender bringing up of Children, first fed and nourished with the Milk of a strange Dug; an unnatural curiosity having taught all Women (but the Beggar) to find out Nurses, which necessity only ought to commend unto them: The hasty Marriages in tender Years, wherein, Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her, and replant her Branches, while her self hath not yet any Root sufficient to maintain her own top; and such half-ripe Seeds (for the most part) in their growing up wither in the Bud, and wax old even in their Infancy. But above all things the exceeding Luxuriousness of this gluttonous Age, wherein we press Nature with overweighty Burdens, and finding her strength defective, we take the work out of her Hands, and commit it to the artificial help of strong Waters, hot Spices, and provoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these elegant Verses:

Luxuries, nunquam parvo contenta parato:
Et quæsitorum terra pelagoq; Ciborum
Ambitiosa fames, & lauta gloria mensæ,
Discite quam parvo liceat producere vitam:
Et quamum Natura petat.
Non auro myrrhaque bibunt: sed gurgite puro
Vita redit: satis est populis fluvinsq; Ceresq;

O wastful Riot, never well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of cates by Land and Sea far fetcht and sent:
Vain glory of a Table sumptuous,
Learn with how little Life may be preserved.
In Gold and Myrrh they need not to carrouse,
But with the Brook the peoples thirst is served:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not sterved.

The Ægyptians affirm, that the longest time of Mans life is a hundred Years, because the Heart in a perfect Body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty Years, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophy, that the Life of Man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty Years, and Berosus to a hundred and seventeen Years. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reproveth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number and review of the eighth Region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (saith Pliny) four and fifty persons of an hundred Years of Age: seven and fifty of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred and five and twenty: four, of an hundred and thirty: as many that were a hundred and five and thirty, or a hundred and seven and thirty Years old: and last of all, three Men of an hundred and forty: and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Son. Plin. Hist. nat. l. 21. Plin. l. 7. c. 49.

The simple diet and temperate life of the Essaans gave them long account of many Years: so did it to the Secretaries of Ægyptian Ceremonies, to the Persians, Magicians and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirm out of Homer, that Nestor lived three Ages, and Tiresias six, Sibylla three hundred Years, Endymion of the less Asia, little less: Also Masinissa of Numidia lived very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many lived three hundred Years (saith Ephorus) Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them live full two hundred Years: and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians) and that these reports are not fabulous; Josephus bringeth many witnesses with himself, as Marethon, Berosus, Mochus, Estius, Hieronymus Ægyptius, Hecatæus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthonie Fume an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the Year 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, General of the Turks Army, who had outlived three hundred Years. I my self knew the old Countess of Desmond of Inchiquin in Munster, who lived in the Year 1589. and many Years since, who was married in Edward the Fourth's time, and held her Joynture from all the Earls of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witness. Stroxxius Cigogna, out of Torquemada Maffæus, and the like Authors, telleth of some that have not only far Joseph. antiq. l. 13. cap. 8. Plin. l. 7. c. 48.

exceeded the Term prescribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered estate of decrepit Age to fresh Youth. But for length of Life, if we note but the difference between the ability of Men in those days wherein Galen the Physician lived, it may easily prove unto us what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let Bloud six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the natural causes of a long and healthful Life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and thin Air, and temperate use of Diet, Pleasure, and Rest: for those which are built of rotten Timber, or mouldring Stone, cannot stand long upright; on Air we feed always and in every instant, and on Meats but at times: and yet the heavy load of abundance, wherewith we oppress and overcharge Nature, maketh her to sink unawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good Constitution, a pure Air, and a temperate use of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only Friends and Companions of a long Life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs delivering their Knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

A Fourth Scruple hath been made, How the certain knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written, and if any such had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the universal floud.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder Ages, we shall find that knowledge was the greatest Treasure that men sought for, and which they also covered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreverent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in Nature, the same was not left to publick dispute, but delivered over by Heart and Tradition from wise Men to Posterity equally zealous, Ex animo in animum sine literis, media intercedente verbo; From mind to mind without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdras, Origen, and Hilarius, (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Moses did not only upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but withall secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem, a more secret and true explanation of the Law, which (saith he out of the same Authors,) he delivered by mouth to Joshua, and Joshua to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere margaritas, than to give holy things to Dogs, and to cast pearls before swine. In succeeding times this Understanding and Wisdom began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the form of Beasts, Birds, and other Creatures; and to be taught only to such, as served in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jews was an Imitation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsly.

This Cabala importeth a Law received by Tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiving in English. And this Custom was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Britains, and of later times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rymers. If then such as would seem wisest in the use of Reason, will not acknowledge, that the Story of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by Inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by Tradition (them used) be delivered unto him by a more certain presumption, than any or all the Testimonies which prophane Antiquity had preserved and left to their Successors; which their wise Men (as they term them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazards. For, leaving to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his Children and Successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem lived together with Adam himself Two hundred forty and three years, and Noah with Methusalem no less than Five hundred years: and before Noah died Abraham was fifty and eight years old; from whence this Knowledge by an easie and ordinary way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this Tradition, it is questionless, that the use of Letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by those Prophecies written on Pillars of Stone and Brick by Enoch: of which Josephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time, (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which Pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these Prophecies of Enoch Saint Jude testifieth, and some part of his Books (which contained the course of the Stars, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba: (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had seen and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation and story of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by Tradition and Letters, had not the Spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange Miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Books of Enoch, howsoever some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazeus, (with others) cite them in their Writings: although Medina, for an Argument to prove them unwritten Traditions, alledgeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphal Scriptures (which he rejecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembred out of them, the same was delivered by Tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Pererius that such a Book there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Hereticks, who took occasion upon the Antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devil about the Body of Moses, to frame and add thereunto many Inventions of their own. One of the greatest Arguments against these Books, is that neither Philo, nor Josephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this Opinion of St. Augustine, Scripsisse quidem nonnulla divina Enoch illum septimum ab Adam negare non possumus: That Enoch the seventh from Adam did write divers divine things we cannot deny. Now his Writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the Antiquity, and of fables of Giants supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found among those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Judaico (saith *Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Orig. Homil. 28. in Num. & comment. in Evang. Johan. Gelas. dist. 15.

* Tertul. de habit. mulierum.

this Book might be preserved by Noah. Surely that Enoch wrote the Prophecies remembred by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to posterity I know not, whether by the Jews Cabala, or by what other means, the same is but man's conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and conjuctions of the Stars; and afterwards to some of his Sons, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seen and might preserve this Book. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath been said before. And therefore if Letters and Arts were known from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah: it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by Letters, or by Cabala and Tradition, had the undoubted Word of God need of any other proof than Self-authority.

Heb. 11. 5.

§. VII.

Of the Men of Renown before the Flood.

NOW let us consider the Relation of Moses, who nameth seven descents of Cain's Children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being given by God in stead of Abel; and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to profess Religion, and to offer Sacrifice in publick. For although Adam instructed his Children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the Sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publickly to call on the Name of the Lord, that is, they served and praised God by Communion and in publick manner, or calling upon the Name of the Lord, and thereby were the Sons of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the Son of Seth, to the time of Henoch the Son of Jared, there is nothing remembred by Moses, but their own births, the births of their Sons, the length of their Lives, and Deaths. But of Henoch it is written, that he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a just and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses useth of Noah. Noah was a just and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy convert it, Enoch placuit Deo: Henoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others understand this place, [tulit eum Deus] scilicet, mortuus est, God took him away (that is) he died, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech unto this day, to say, God took him away, when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh between the Piety of Henoch and the rest of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word [death] which he useth to all else, makes it manifest, that Henoch was not dissolved as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses useth these words, And he died; but of Henoch he spake otherwise, saying only, he was missing, or he was not seen. Et non inveniebatur (saith the Epistle to the Hebrews) quia Deus eum transtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord took him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

Gen. 5. 24.

6. 9.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kind of changing, which Saint Paul promiseth when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all die; but all shall be changed; I leave it to the learned Divines.

1 Cor. 15. 51.

After Henoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their Birth and Death: saving that Lamech prophesied of his Son Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our Work, and sorrow of our Hands, as touching the Earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, than of any of the rest of Adam's Children by Seth, being the last of the ten Generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Family) preserved, because he was an upright Man in his time, and feared God.

Gen. 5. 29.

Gen. 6. 9.

But of the War, Peace, Government, and Policy of these strong and mighty Men, so able both in Body and Wit, there is no memory remaining: whose Stories if they had been preserved, and what else was then performed in that newness of the World, there could nothing of more delight have been left to Posterity. For the exceeding long Lives of Men (who to their strength of Body and natural Wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. years) how much of necessity must the same add of Wisdom and Undertakings? Likely it is, that their Works excelled all whatsoever can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old Age of the World, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates, Vita brevis, Ars longa, Tempus præceps, (which is) Life is short, Art is long, and Time is headlong. And that those people of the first Age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses, These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renown. But these Men of Renown (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of Body and cruelty of Mind) trusted so much to their own Abilities, as they forgat altogether the Piety of Seth, and the ways wherein Henoch walked: for all the imagination of their hearts were evil, only evil, and continually evil. And this Wickedness was not only found in the Issues of Cain, but it was then universal, when the Children and Sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and misled by their idolatrous Wives, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other Men loving themselves and the World only.

Aphor. 1.

Gen. 5. 4.

v. 5.

That these Sons of God were Angels, which being taken with the Beauty of Women accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely Lactantius and Eusebius mis-led by Josephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former Opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large Answers and very needless: the Question being uncapable of dispute, especially since St. Chrysostome and St. Augustine have answered it largely long ago. For, that good and godly Men were honoured with the Title of God's Children, it doth every where appear in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to think that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) always attend his Commandments, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madness to imagin.

Gen. 6. 1. v. 2.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moſes ſo called, were indeed Men of huge Bodies: as alſo divers in latter times.

OF theſe Giants which Moſes calleth mighty men, Goropius Becanus an Antwerpian (who thought his own Wit more Gigantical than the Bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large Diſcourſe, intituled Gigantomachia, and ſtrained his Brains to prove, that there were never any ſuch Men: his Reaſons (whoſoever deſires to loſe time) he may find them in the Treatiſes beforenamed. It is true that Cyrillus reproves the Græcian Poets for their monſtrous Fictions: who affirm ſhamelеſſly, That the Giants have in elder times not only caſt up Mountains upon Mountains, but removed Iſlands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that Invention of caſting up Hills, and making War with the Gods, no doubt but that the ſame was borrowed out of the Story of Nimrod, as before remembred; and even out of this Scripture, That the Sons of God ſaw the Daughters of Men, of whom the firſt Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Heſiodus, That Giants were the Sons of the Heaven and the Earth; meaning by the Heavens the Sons of God, and by the Earth the Daughters of Men: which Verſes of Orpheus are by John Caſſam (who hath written a witty Diſcourſe of this Subject) thus changed into Latin:

Nomine cœleſtes illos dixêre Gigantes,
Orti quòd terrâ fuerint & ſanguine cœli.

From the Earth, and from thy Blood, O Heaven, they came,
Whom thereupon the Gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and ſelf-believing Men diſpute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the firſt Age ſuch kind of Men; and of which there have been in all times ſince? ſeeing the Scriptures avow the one manifeſtly, and common experience the other?

And for that ſuperlative ſtraining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was given to Oppreſſors and Tyrants, and not to ſtrength of Body and eminent Stature: ſuch Men might with better reaſon call them Oppreſſors becauſe they were Giants, and therefore had ability to oppreſs, than ſay, That they were called Giants only becauſe Oppreſſors. For firſt Moſes himſelf calleth them mighty Men; which ſheweth a ſtrength ſurpaſſing others: and afterwards, Men of Renown, (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous Action. And if the ſame Stature of Body, and Ability had not been found among divers Nations after the general Flood, then might this place of Moſes have more willingly hearkned to a Diſpute, and yielded to Interpretation.

But beſides all theſe famous Giants found in prophane Hiſtories (which I will reſerve to accompany the Giants of Albion in the Story of Britany) the Scriptures do clearly and without all Allegorical conſtruction avow, That, beſides Nimrod, there were found of theſe Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moſes, of Joſhua, and of David; namely the Rephaims in Aſteroth; the Zuzei or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims, which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moſes (for Stature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they alſo were taken for Giants as the Anakims: Likewiſe where Moſes ſpeaketh of the Land of Ammon, he uſeth theſe words, That alſo was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein aforetimes: and whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And theſe Giants called Rephaims in Aſteroth and Kernaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam overthrew, aſſiſted by other Kings his Aſſociates. Alſo the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites Men of Giant-like Stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whoſe ſtrength to the Oaks; and the Prophet Baruch, Theſe were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of ſo great ſtature, and ſo expert in war. Particularly it is written of Og, King of Baſan, that his Bed of Iron was nine Cubits long, and four Cubits broad: for only Og King of Baſan remained of the Remnants of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdom of Baſan, four hundred Years after the expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover thoſe Diſcoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promiſe (ſent by Moſes from Cadesbarne in Paran) made Report at their return of the great Stature of thoſe People in general, and eſpecially of the Sons of Anak, in theſe words. All the people which we ſaw in it are men of great ſtature: for there we ſaw Giants, the ſons of Anak which come of the Giants, ſo that we ſeemed in our ſights like Graſs-hoppers, and ſo we were in their ſight; (that is) the Searchers found in their own Judgments a marvelous difference between the Anakims and themſelves: inſomuch that the Iſraelites were ſo ſtricken with fear, as they rather ſought and deſired to return again into Ægypt, and were more willing to endure their former ſlavery, than to fall by the ſtrokes of thoſe fearful Nations. Furthermore the Scriptures put us out of doubt, that Goliah the Philiſtine of Gath was a Giant of ſix Cubits and a Span long: the Armour which he wore weighed Five thouſand ſhekles of Braſs: the Shaft of his Spear was like a Weavers Beam, and his Spear-head weighed Six hundred Shekles of Iron. Alſo in Samuel there is mention of another Goliah ſirnamed Gethæus, becauſe he was of Gath: and of three other Giants, of which the firſt was ſlain by Jehonathan, David's Nephew, who had twelve Fingers, and as many Toes: a Man of great Stature, and his Fingers were by ſixes, even four and twenty.

Alſo that Sampſon was of ſurpaſſing ſtrength no Man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had been a Kid, and after ſlew thirty of the Philiſtines, and (after that) a thouſand more of them with a Jawbone of an Aſs; And laſtly he took the Gates of Azzah, and the two Poſts, and lifted them away with the Bars, and put them upon his Shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountain before Ebron. If then it be approved by every Judgment, that both Nature and the Heavens wax old, and that the great Age of Time hath (with it ſelf) infeebled and almoſt worn out the vertue of all things, then I ſay, That as in all other kinds the Earth (before that Sin had increaſed the Curſe and Corruption) brought forth her young ones more ſtrong and beautiful than it did in after-ages: ſo alſo thoſe Giants, thoſe mighty Men, and Men of Renown as far exceeded the proportion, nature and ſtrength of thoſe Giants remembred by Moſes of his own time, and after him their ſucceſſors, as the ordinary proportion of all Men in general, ſoon after the Flood and in times far off, exceeded the bulks and bodies of Men which are now born in the withered Quarter and Winter of the World: If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth Age, much more in the firſt flouriſhing youth and newneſs of the World.

But

But the wickedness (especially in cruelty and oppression) of these Men was such, as God therefore by the Flood gave end to all Flesh, but to the just Noah and his Family. And God repented him that he had made man; which S. Augustine thus expoundeth: Neque enim sicut hominem, ita Deum fallit sui pœnitet, cujus est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quàm certa præscientia. Sed si non utatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiarius insinuabit omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: ut & perversos superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exercens quærentes, & sanctos intelligentes. God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done, (as men use to do:) but if the Scripture did not use those words, or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it self familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of Truth, and nourish those that understand.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous Corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these Ancient Times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in Old Corruptions we may find some Signs of more Ancient Truth.

HERE before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it self for us to consider, how the Greeks and other more Ancient Nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the Story of the Creation, and by delivering it over in a mystical sense, wrapping it up mixed with other their own trumpery, have sought to obscure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive those intermixt Discourses of God and Nature for the inventions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolen out of the Books of God. But as a skilful and learned Chymist can as well by separation of visible Elements draw helpful Medicines out of Poyson, as Poyson out of the most healthful Herbs and Plants (all things having in themselves both Life and Death) so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seek after God and Truth find out every where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the Works and Marvails thereof, amply and lively expresst.

§. II.

That the Corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Ægyptians.

BUT this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning Mankind it took such effect, that thereby (the liberal Grace of God being withdrawn) all the Posterity of our first Parents were afterwards born and bred in a World, suffering a perpetual Eclipse of spiritual Light. Hence it was that it produced Plants of such imperfection and harmful quality, as the Waters of the general Flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very Generation and Nature of Mankind. Yea, even among the few Sons of Noah there were found strong effects of the former Poyson. For as the Children of Sem did inherit the Vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the Sons of Cham did possess the Vices of the Sons of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldæans began soon after the Flood to ascribe Divine Power and Honour to the Creature, which was only due to the Creator. First, they worshipped the Sun, and then the fire. So the Ægyptians and Phœnicians did not only learn to leave the True God, but created twelve several gods, and divine powers, whom they worshipped; and unto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Ægyptios in usu habuisse, unde; Græcos abillis accepisse mutuatos, eosque prius aras, & imagines & templa Diis sibi erexisse. The Ægyptians (saith he) first devised the names of the twelve Gods, which the Greeks received from them, who first erected unto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the Gods.

Herod. in Euterp.

§. III.

That in process of time these lesser Errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the gross superstitions of the Ægyptians.

BUT as Men once fallen away from undoubted Truth, do then after wander for evermore in Vices unknown, and daily travel towards their Eternal perdition: so did these gross and blind Idolaters every Age after other descend lower and lower, and shrink and slide downwards from the knowledg of one True and very God; and did not thereby err in worshipping mortal Men only, but they gave Divine Reverence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowls, Winds, Earth, Water, Air, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees and Roots, to Passions and Affections of the Mind, to Paleness, Sickness, Sorrows, yea to the most unworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous Blasphemy Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner:

Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7.

Bovem colis, ego Deis macto bovem.
Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas: ego
Obsoniorum credidi suavissimum.
Carnes sullas tu caves, at gaudeo
His maximè: canem colis, quem verbera
Edentem ubi deprehendo fortè obsonium.

I Sacrifice to God the Beef, which you adore:
I broil the Ægyptian Eels, which you (as God) implore:

You

You fear to eat the Flesh of Swine, I find it sweet.
You worship Dogs, to beat them I think meet,
When they my store devour.

And in this manner Juvenal:

Sat. 15. 2. 9. Porrum aut cepe nefas violare aut frangere morsu:
O sanctas gentes, quibus hac nascuntur in hortis Numina!

The Ægyptians think it sin to root up, or to bite
Their Leeks or Onions, which they serve with holy rite:
O happy Nations, which of their own sowing
Have store of Gods in every Garden growing.

§ IV.

That from the Reliques of Ancient Records among the Ægyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and that the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

BUT in so great a confusion of Vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these Inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient Pattern they erected their building, were it not certain, that the Ægyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein; partly from some Inscriptions upon Stone or Metal remaining after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the Son of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham. and Cham of his Father Noah. For all that the Ægyptians write of their ancient Kings and date of Times cannot be feigned. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the rest which S. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many Prophane Historians; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more have observed, to wit the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain the Son of Adam (as some very learned Men conceive) called and reputed for the first and ancient Jupiter; and Adam for the first Saturn: for Jupiter was said to have invented the founding of Cities; and the first City of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochii before remembred. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinus in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For besides that, many Cities were founded by divers Men, Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo Jove ædificatam; yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupiter, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East-side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochii were found after the Flood. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an incloser or strengthener of Cities; (say Phornutus and Pausanias) and that to Jupiter Herceios there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Flood. Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soon after Mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which as his meaning he delivereth in plain terms, in his third Book of Laws: for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the Destruction by the great Flood.

This first Jupiter, of the Ethnicks was then the same Cain, the Son of Adam, who marrying his own Sister (as also Jupiter is said to have done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de Urbibus placeth the City Henochia. And besides this City of Henoch, Philo Judæus conceiveth that Cain built six others, as Maich, Jared, Tebe, Jesca, Selet and Gebat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Jupiter, and from whom also the Ethnicks had the invention of Sacrifice: so were Jubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (Inventors of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musick) the same, which were called by the ancient Prophane writers Mercurius, Vulcan and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noema or Naamath, the Sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Venustia, or beautiful Voluptas, or pleasure; as the Wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Lady of Pleasure and Beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturn, Cain the eldest Jupiter, Eva Rhea, and Noema or Naamath the first Venus: so did the Fable of the dividing of the World between the three Brethren the Sons of Saturn arise, from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth between the three Brethren the Sons of Noah: so also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon taken from the Serpent, which tempted Evah: so was Paradise it self transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the Prophecies, that Christ should break the Serpents Head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captivating Cerberus: so out of the taking up of Henoch by God was borrowed the conversion of their Heroes (the Inventors of Religion and such Arts as the life of Man had profit by) into Stars and Heavenly Signs, and (withal) that leaving of the World, and Ascension of Astræa; of which Ovid,

Astræa last of Heavenly Wights the Earth did leave.

For although thereby the Ethnicks would understand Justice it self to have failed, as it is a vertue abstract, and may be considered without a Person; yet as it is usual among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the Persons of Men and Women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beauty or Lust by Venus, so do they also the Persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices; and therefore by Justice and Astræa, Enoch: the Justice and Piety of Enoch being in the same manner expresst, as that of Noah was by Moses, for Noah was said to be a just Man; And Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, that he walked with God, and he was no more seen: for God took him away.

Gen. 5. Gen. 6. 22, 24.

From this Story also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the Giants begotten by the Sons of good Men upon the Daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mighty Men, and Men of Renown) did they steal those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerful Giants; and again their War undertaken against the Gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as S. Augustine terneth him. Which War of their Giants Cornelius Severus thus describeth:

L. de Civit. Dei.

Ter-

Tentavêre (nefas) olim detrudere mundo
Sydera, captivique Jovis transferre Gigantes:
Imperium, & victo leges imponere cœlo.

The Giants did advance their wicked hand
Against the Stars, to thrust them headlong down
And robbing Jove of his Imperial Crown,
On conquered Heavens to lay their proud Command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the Building of Babel to that heighth, as God neither by drawing Waters from the Deep, nor by any conjunction of the Stars, should bury them under the moisture of a second Flood, but that by this Building (if they had been herein victorious) they would have given the Law to Heaven it self. Also the making of Leagues, Peace and Covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by Sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Æneids hath a touch, was as it seemeth borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. Who when he read the Book of the Covenant sprinkled the People with Blood.

Joseph. l. 1. cont. Appion. We find also many Remembrances of Seth, the paternal Ancestor of Henoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Ægypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the Children of Israel, (as of late some learned Men mistaking his time supposed) called his Son and Successor Sethos, of Seth, and of the same Seth (as many Men of good judgment have granted (were the Princes of Thrace called Sethes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memory of Seth most manifestly preserved, that the Ægyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient Parent, and of the first Tradition: in honour of whom they called a principal Province Sethetica. Plut. in Isid. We also find in Bithynia the City of Sethia, and others of the same Name elsewhere. Strabo. l. 17. And sure from the Ægyptians did the Gracians borrow this kind of Theology, though they scorned to acknowledge any Antiquity preceding their own; and that they might not seem to learn elsewhere, they gave the same Names to their own Idols which the Ægyptians did to theirs.

§. V.

Of the three chiefest Jupiters; and the strange Story of the third.

But of all those Armies of Jupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most Fame: which other Writers have also done, who sought out, and laboured in their Originals.

The first was Jupiter, the Son of Æther and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestial conditions (for Æther is as much as shining or pure Fire) the other discovered his natural Vertues, which days and times make more perfect, and are the witnesses of Mens actions.

The second was said to be the Son of Cœlum or Heaven, for the same former respect; and this Jupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The third, of whom all the Grecian Fables were devised, was of Crete (now Candie) the Son of Saturn and Ops. The Name derived from the Latin is taken of Juvans Pater, from the Greek word Zeus, it signifieth Life, but somewhat strained. Boccas in his Genealogy of the Gods conceiveth, that his Name was borrowed from Jupiter the Planet; but whether that Star had such a Name, before the same was given to Men, I know not. Jupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, adventurous, liberal, merciful, loving, and faithful, (that is) giving these Inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these Conditions, might be called there after Jupiter; but howsoever they were, or were not with those Vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Sirnames: great Princes affecting as high Titles of Honour and Reputation in the World, (howsoever deserved) as the worthiest, that ever were, acquired by their well-deservings. Jovem omnes Reges vocârunt antiqui; The Ancients called all Kings Jupiters, as Tzetzes in his Varia Historia confirmeth: Reges olim Jovis vocârunt omnes: In old time all Nations called their Kings Jupiters. But where this last and most remembred Jupiter was born it is uncertain. Some there are that make him of Creet: others, that he was but sent thither by his Mother Ops or Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the fury of Titan his Uncle: because it was conditioned between Saturn and Titan, that Saturn being a younger Brother, and reigning (for his own Life) by Titan's permission, he should put to death all his male Children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their Succession; which Agreement because Saturn performed in his first-born, it is feigned that Saturn devoured his own Children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latin, Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7.

Haud sit pinguior,
Crudis sepulchrum quòd sit ipse filiis.

Saturn to be the fatter is not known,
By being the Grave and Burial of his own.

This composition between Titan and Saturn, Sibylla also witnesseth in these,

Conceptis verbis; Titan jurare coegit
Saturnum, de se natum ne nutriat illum,
Quo possint regnare Jovis post fata Nepotes.

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturn swear,
No Son to nourish; which by reigning might Usurp the Right of Titan's lawful Heir.

But Opis, the Mother of Jupiter, being delivered at once both of Jupiter and Juno, conveyed Jupiter (first called Lysanias) into Creet, as she did afterwards his two Brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought up in Gnossus, the chief City of that Island, by Cresta the King, or by the Curetes, a People and Nation thereof. Euseb. in Timp.

Others challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messina. The like Contention is found among the Greeks touching his Education and first Fostering. Some affirm, that he was fed by Hony-bees: in Recompence whereof he changed their black Coats and Skins into yellow; a Reward well fitting such a God: others, that he was nourished by Bears: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greeks have many pretty Tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturn had broken his Faith, he set on him, and took him and his Wife Prisoners, whom Jupiter again rescued and delivered.

But lastly, the Father and the Son equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturn being the lesse powerful fled into Italy, and left his Kingdoms in Greece to his Son. And although this Prince at the first purchased great Honour, and for his many Vertues the Name of Jupiter was given him; yet, after he was once setled and became potent, he gave himself over wholly to Palliardize and Adultery, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such, as do ascribe the Actions of many to one Jupiter, that not therewith satisfied, he was afterwards known to offend in the Sin of Sodom with Ganymedes and others; and did not only begin with Incest, marrying his own Sister Juno, but he ravished, betrayed, stole away, and took by strong hand all the beautiful Women born in his time, within the Limits of his own Kingdoms, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest Fame, Niobe, Laodemia, and Alcmena the Wife of Amphitryon, by whom he had Pelasgus, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus, of whom the Mountain Taygetus took Name, with another Son called Saon, of whom Sauona: by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda, Castor & Pollux, Helen & Clytemnestra: by Danae Perseus: by Jordana Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis; by Protogenia he had Aethlius the Father of Endymon; and by Io (the Daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the Founder of Memphis in Ægypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Country took Name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa. He ravished Ægina, the Daughter of Æsopus, and carried her into the Island Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Ægina, on whom he begat Æacus: by Torlebia he had Archesilaus and Curbius: by Ora Celaxes: he had also Dardanus by Electra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilion and Troy. He begat the Brothers Talici, on Thalia, and on Garamantis Hiarbas. He had besides these (if they bely not their chief God) Philemon and Pilumnus, Inventers of Bakers Craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be Father to all these, who were born in Ages so far differing. And of these his several Ravishments, Betrayings, stealing away of Mens Wives, Daughters and Sons, buying of Virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient Fables of his Transformations into showers of Gold, Eagles, Bulls, Birds, and Beasts, and of him, and by him (in effect) all that Rable of Grecian Forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans fear to entitle this Monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Book de natura Deorum affirm, that he deserved nothing lesse. And in his Oration pro domo sua reproacheth Clodius for his Incest, by the Name of Jupiter. His Burial was in Crete (saith Lucian) Cretenses non solum natum apud se & sepultum Jovem testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum ejus ostendunt. The Cretians or Candians do not only avow that Jupiter was born and buried among them, but they shew his Grave and Sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remained the Monuments of his Tomb in the Mountain Jasius. This Callimachus in his Hymns also witnesseth, but as offended thereat, saith thus:

Luc. in sacrif.

The Cretians ever Lyars were, they care not what they say:
For they a Tomb have built for thee, O King, that liv'st alway.

Diodorus Siculus tells by way of Report from the Libyan Fables, confirmed (as he saith) by some Greek Writers, that the Original of these Gods was from the Western parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantida reigned one Uranus (which signifieth Heaven) called so for his great skill in Astrology, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the People, honoured by them as a God after his death. He had by many Wives, forty five Sons; but by his principal Wife Titea he had seventeen Sons and two Daughters, all which were called after their Mothers Name the Titanes. Of Titea likewise it is said, that she for her goodness was Canonized as a Goddess, being dead, and called the Earth, as her Husband was stiled Heaven. But of all the Children of Titea, her Daughter Basilea (which Name sounding as Queen in English, she is by the Latine Translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as far in Vertue as in Years, was by general consent of her Brethren, and of the People, appointed to rule as Queen after her Fathers death, being as yet a Virgin. She took to Husband her Brother Hyperion, to whom she bare a Son and a Daughter, called Sun and Moon. The beauty and towardliness of these Children moved her Brethren to envy, and bred in them a fear of being excluded from the Succession: wherefore they took the Boy and drowned him in the River Eridanus, now called Po. The loss of this Child caused his Sister to break her own Neck; and the loss of both her Children made the Mother to play many mad Pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wild fashion, in sight of all the People, before whom she is said to have vanished away. Ere she died, her Son (as the Fable hath it) signified unto her in a Dream, that he and his Sister by the providence of God should become immortal, that also the Sun and Moon should be called by their Names, and that their Death should be revenged upon the Murderers. According to which it is said, that the People did so call those two Planets, and withall held her self as a Goddess, and termed her the great Mother, which Name they had formerly given to her, for her Motherly Care in cherishing her Brethren whilst they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other Sons of Uranus divided the Kingdom. Of these Atlas and Saturn were chief. Atlas reigned over the Countries lying about the Mountains, which afterward bare his Name; a just and wise Prince, deeply skilful in Astrology, and for Invention of the Sphere said to have supported Heaven. He had many Sons; but the principal of them called Hesperus, being of his Fathers qualities and studies, was said to have been carried away by the Wind, from the top of an high Hill in the midst of his Contemplations, and his Name in honour of him, imposed by the People upon the Morning Star. The seven Daughters of Atlas were also said to have been excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Deified, or Registred among the Worthies, brought forth Children, answerable in quality to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seven Stars called Pleiades took Name. Saturn the Brother of Atlas reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italy. Jupiter another of the Sons of Uranus, reigned in Crete, who had ten Sons which he called Curetes; he called that Island after his Wives Name Ida, in which Isle he died, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not have been that great one, but Uncle to the great Jupiter, if these Fables of the Libyans were true. Saturn (as these Libyans tell the Tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keep his people in subjection. His Sister Rhea was married married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk. Hammon loving others as well as his Wife, or better, got a Daughter, called Minerva, near to the River Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. He also begat on Amalthea a Son called Bacchus, whom he caused secretly for fear of his life to be brought up at Nysa, an Island in the River Triton, under the tuition of his Daughter Minerva, and certain Nymphs. To Amalthea he gave in reward a goodly Country, that lay on the Sea coast, bending in form of a Horn, whence grew the tale of Amalthea's plentiful Horn, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these news, she fled from her Husband to her Brother Saturn, who not only entertained her as a Sister, but took her to Wife, and at her instigation made War upon Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him fly into Crete. The Curetes, Jupiter's Children before-mentioned, held the Island at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings Daughter, whom he took to Wife, and had with her (Women as may seem being very gracious in those times) the Kingdom. Bacchus was grown a proper young Man, had found out the making of Wine, the art of planting Trees, and many things else commodious for Mankind, before the flight of his Mother-in-Law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had happened, and that Saturn was coming against him with the Titans; he levied an Army, to which the Amazons living not far from Nysa, added great Forces, in love of Minerva, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the Men, and Minerva the Women, they set forward against Saturn, met him, overthrew him, and taking many of the Titans Prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the Prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second expedition. In the second expedition he behaved himself so well, that he wan the love of all the People by whom he passed; insomuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturn's rigorous Government, he was greatly strengthened, and the Enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts. Coming to the City of Hammon, he wan a Battel of Saturn, before the very Walls. After which Saturn with his Wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Town on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturn had a young Son by Rhea, called Jupiter. This Child Bacchus took with him in a great expedition that he made into the East Countries; and coming into Ægypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a Boy, Governor of the Country; but appointed unto him as an Overseer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whilst Bacchus traveled through all Nations, as far as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of Man; the Titans had found out his Father Hammon in Crete, and began to War upon him. But Bacchus returned out of India; with whom Jupiter from Ægypt, and his Sister Minerva, together with the rest that afterwards were held as Gods, joyning all their Forces, went into Crete, overthrew the Titans, chased them, took, and slew them, and freed the World of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Jupiter the son of Saturn succeeding them, reigned Lord alone over all the World, having none of the Titans left alive, nor any other to disturb him. Between this tale of the Lybian Gods, and the Ægyptian Fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true History. For the expeditions of Osiris, and of Bacchus; the Wars of the Giants in the one story, of the Titans in the other; the Kingdom of Ægypt given by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Bacchus to Jupiter, the Rattles of Isis, and the Cymbals of Basilea, with many petty circumstances, nearly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right Persons. Sanchoniato (as Eusebius cites him) would have all these to be Phœnicians, and is earnest in saying, that it is a true story, and no Allegory. Yet he makes it seem the more Allegorical, by giving to Uranus or Heaven for Daughters, Fate and Beauty, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus have enough. To the Genealogy he adds Elius or the Sun, as Father of Uranus; and among the Children of Uranus, Iapetus, Batilus, and Dagon, (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giving withal to Uranus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturn, but omitting Jupiter of Crete. The Pedigree of them is this. Euseb. li. 1. c. 7.

§. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

OF Jupiter Belus, the Son of Saturnus Babylonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembred: for long after these times were the Greeks but Salvages, if they seek no farther off for their Gods.

But the Ægyptians, even after the Flood, began (somewhat before this Chaldæan Jupiter) to intitle Cham, the Parent of their own Mizraim, Jupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word [Hammon] which the Greeks deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peucer) neither yet is his own much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth heat: because the said Temple of Jupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the Air is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the Antiquity of the latter Jupiter (among the Greeks and Romans the most renowned) it is certain that he was born not long before the War of Troy, as by many of his Sons is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that Age of Priamus, under whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed.

Peucer de Oracul.

Now seeing that mortal Men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortal among the Heathen; it was not to be wondred at, that Alexander Macedon, Tiberius, Nero, Caligula, and others sought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed Monsters as the rest: For by what reason could the same Deity be denied unto Laurentia and Flora, which was given to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous Harlots as she was.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had far better opinions of God.

BUT that ever Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, believed in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (over busily) have mixed their own inventions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in Hell, where he feigned that they were perpetually stung and and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read over all the Books of Moſes, as by places ſtoln thence almoſt word for word, may appear; of which Juſtine Martyr remembreth many in that Treatiſe converted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though he diſſembled in ſome things, for fear of the Inquiſition of the Areopagites, yet S. Auguſtine hath already anſwered for him (as before remembred) Et mirificè iis delectatus eſt, quæ de uno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the Doctrine of one God, ſaith Juſtine Martyr. Now howſoever Lactantius pleaſed to reprehend Plato, becauſe (ſaith he) Plato ſought knowledge from the Ægyptians, and the Chaldæans, neglecting the Jews, and the Books of Moſes: Euſebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, find reaſon to believe the contrary, thinking that from thence he took the grounds of all by him written of God, or ſavouring of Divinity: and the ſame opinion had S. Ambroſe of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the ſame vanity, which poſſeſt all thoſe learned Philoſophers and Poets, that Plato alſo publiſhed (not under the right Authors names) thoſe things which he had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the ſeverity of the Areopagites, and the example of his Maſter Socrates, by them put to death by Poyſon, I cannot judge. Juſtine Martyr (as it ſeemeth) aſcribeth it wholly to Plato's fear, whoſe words among many other of the ſame effect, are theſe, Plato Moſis mentionem facere, ob id, quod unum ſolumque Deum docuerat, ſibi apud Athenienſes tutum non putavit, veritus Areopagum; Plato fearing the Areopagites thought it not ſafe for him among the Athenians to make mention of Moſes, that he taught that there is but one God. But for that Divinity which he hath written in Timæo; id ipſum de Deo diſſerit quod & Moſes; he diſcourſed and taught the ſame of God (ſaith Juſtine Martyr) which Moſes did. For where it pleaſed God by his Angel to anſwer Moſes, Ego ſum exiſtens (which is) I am; and exiſtens miſit me ad vos, I am hath ſent me unto you, herein did Plato (ſaith Juſtine Martyr) no otherwiſe differ than that Moſes uſed the word [qui] and Plato the word quod: Moſes enim qui exiſtit (inquit) Plato quod exiſtit. For Moſes ſaith, He who is; Plato That which is. Now of Gods incomprehenſible Nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or expreſs the ſame, he giveth this teſtimony: Genitorem Univerſitatis tam difficile eſt invenire, quàm inventum impoſſibile dignè profari, It is as hard to find out the Creator of the Univerſal, as it is impoſſible, if he were found, to ſpeak of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Majeſty of Gods Nature, than this property by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus cauſa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non cauſa, God is abſolutely good, and ſo (aſſuredly) the cauſe of all that is good: but of any thing that is evil he is no cauſe at all: and again, Charitas Dei fuit cauſa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum, The love of God was the cauſe of the Worlds creating, and the original of all things. Apuleius the Platoniſt, Summus Deus infinitus eſt, non ſolum loci excluſione ſed etiam naturæ dignitate: Et nihil eſt Deo ſimilius & gratius, quàm vir animo perfecto bonus, The moſt high God is alſo an infinite God, not only by excluſion of place, but by the dignity of Nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God than a man of a perfect heart. Thales affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the moſt ancient, quia nunquam eſſe cœpit, becauſe he never had any beginning: Zeno, that God beheld even the thoughts of Men: Athenodorus, that therefore all Men ought to be careful in the actions of their life, becauſe God was every where preſent, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moſes ſtory of the Creation, than this opinion and deſcription of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholar of Anaxagoras?

Areopagus, or domus ſive mons Martis, Mars his Hill: a Houſe wherein capital matters were tried: ſo called at firſt: becauſe Mars therein firſt pleaded his cauſe for the murder of Hulirrothos. Pauſan. in Attic. Nat. Com. li. 2. ca. 7. Juſt. Mar. adv. gent. fol. 8 14. ut ſup. Exod. 3.14 In Timæo.

All things to light appeared then,
Of Trees, Birds, Beaſts, Fiſhes, and Men
The ſtill-remaining Races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: ſo we find the ſame excellent underſtanding in Orpheus, who every where expreſſed the infinite and ſole power of one God, though he uſe the name of Jupiter, thereby to avoid the envy and danger of the time; but that he could attribute thoſe things to the Sons of Men and mortal Creatures, which he doth to this Jupiter, there is no Man who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Yea that he yet reacheth higher, and ſpeaketh of God himſelf, this his inſtruction to Muſæus, and the Hymn following teach us. *Reſpiciens verò ad divinum hunc ſermonem ei diligenter animum adverte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem aſcende viam, & ſolùm aſpice mundi Regem. Now

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned Men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Ægyptians, Græcians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Justine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius Eugubinus, Peucer, Plessis, Daneus, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these Attributes and Properties. Bonus, justus, sanctus, seipsum possidens, utilis, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himself, profitable, beautiful, best, severe, free, always doing good, safe without fear, glorious, and self-charity. Epicharmus affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced every nature, was only and every where powerful: agreeing with Democritus. Rex omnium ipse solus, He is the only King of all kings; and with Pindarus the Poet; Deus unus, Pater, creator summus, atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diversos secundum merita præbet, One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best Artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Antisthenes) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere known, Nisi in patria illa perenni, cujus imaginem nullam habes, Save only in that everlasting Country, whose Image thou hast none at all. Hereof also Xenophanes Colophonius. Unus Deus inter Deas & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis, There is one God among Gods and Men most powerful, neither corporally, nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensque, quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat, God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mighty, as is manifest to all: but of what form he is, it is manifest to none, save only to himself, who illuminateth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum naturæ causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animantium sospitator, assiduus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neque tempore ullo comprensus, eoque paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis, God is the cause, ground, and original of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the Soul, the eternal preserver of living Creatures, the continual framer of his World, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can express what he is. Therefore was it said by S. Hierome, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum revolvas libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei, ut apud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud Zenonem Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the Books of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in Plato, God the Creator of the World: in Zeno Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal Souls, &c. And this is certain, that if we look into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall find that there never was Man of solid Understanding or excellent Judgment: never any Man whose Mind the art of Education hath not bended; whose Eyes a foolish Superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advised; but that he hath found by an unresistable necessity, one True God, and everlasting Being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; which no Man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly expresst, than that Ægyptian Hermes, howsoever it sailed afterward in his Posterity: all being at length by devilish policy of the Ægyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new Gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Devil perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keep in awe and order their common People.

Hieron. in Com. in Dan. in princip.

§. VIII.

That Heathenism and Judaism, after many wounds were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUT all these are again vanished: for the inventions of mortal Men are no less mortal than themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, is crept into every Mans Chimney, which the lack of Fewel starveth, Water quencheth, and want of Air suffocateth: Jupiter is no more vexed with Juno's jealousies; Death hath perswaded him to Chastity, and her to Patience; and that Time which hath devoured it self, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea, their stately Temples of Stone and dureful Marble. The Houses and sumptuous Buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the Earth; nor any Monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Lybia, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere, that can ask counsel or help from Jupiter. The great God Pan hath broken his Pipes; Apollo's Priests are become speechless; and the Trade of Riddles in Oracles, with the Devils telling Mens Fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Ægyptians, and cozening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Devil gave way to these his overthrows and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and re-edified again, till by the Hand of God himself it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubœan Pirates: Secondly, by the Phlegians utterly sackt: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Army of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captains of the Phocenses: Sixthly, by Nero, who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein again set up at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Army made spoil of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was again gloriously rebuilt, and so remained till such time as Julian the Apostata sent thither to know the success of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heaven; and the Image of Apollo himself, and all the rest of the Idols therein molten down and lost in the Earth.

The like success had the Jews in the same Julian's time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Hierusalem: for while they were busied to lay the Foundations, their Buildings were overthrown by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Jews were overwhelmed with the ruines, and others slain, and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jews, ascribing this to the Nature of that Element. For, saith he, Allypius and the Ruler of the Province of Judæa, being by Julian busied in the reedifying of this this Temple, flaming balls of Fire issuing near the Foundation, and oft consuming the Workmen, made the Enterprise frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Devil to maintain his Kingdom.

NOW the Devil, because he cannot play upon the open Stage of this World (as in those days) and being still as industrious as ever, finds it more for his advantage to creep into the minds of Men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectual adoration of himself than ever. For whereas he first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead Stones cut into Faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idol of glory, the all-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tells them that Truth is the Goddess of Dangers and Oppressions; that Chastity is the Enemy of Nature: and lastly, that as all Vertue (in general) is without taste: so Pleasure satisfieth and delighteth every Sense: for true Wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, than in the obtaining of Power to oppress, and of Riches to maintain plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician find in his Pupils any remorse, any fear or feeling of Gods future Judgment, he perswades them that God hath so great need of Mens Souls, that he will accept them at any time, and upon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timefal return towards God, by laying those great blocks of rugged Poverty, and despised Contempt in the narrow passage leading to his Divine Presence. But as the Mind of Man hath two Ports, the one always frequented by the entrance of manifold Vanities; the other desolate and overgrown with Grass, by which enter our Charitable Thoughts and Divine Contemplations: so hath that of Death a double and twofold opening: worldly Misery passing by the one, worldly Prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our sufferings and patience to attend us: (all which have gone before us to prepare our joys) at the other our Cruelties, Covetousness, Licentiousness, Injustice, and Oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearful and terrible sorrow) staying for us. And as the Devil our most industrious Enemy was ever most diligent: so he is now more laborious than ever: the long Day of Mankind drawing fast towards an Evening, and the Worlds Tragedy and Time near at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noah's Flood.

§. I.

Of God's fore-warning: and some human Testimonies; and some doubting touching the truth of Noah's Flood.

OF this Destruction it pleased God to give warning unto Noah: who (saith Josephus) fearing to perish among the rest, secedens cum suis, in aliam regionem migravit: He departed with his Children, and travelled into another Region. And of these Giants, from whom Noah withdrew himself, Berosus writeth in this manner: That they exceeded in all sorts of inhuman and unnatural wickedness, and that they were contemptores & Religionis & Deorum: contemners of Religion and of the Gods: among which mighty Men (saith Berosus) unus erat qui Deorum venerantior, & prudentior cæteris, &c. hujus nomen erat Noah. There was one more wise and reverencing the Gods than the rest, whose name was Noah: who with his three Sons Sem, Japhetus, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the Wife of Noah, (namely Titea the great, Pandora, Noela, and Naagla) preserved themselves in the Ark. This Ark God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said unto Noah, make thee an Ark of pine-trees: thou shalt make cabins in the Ark, and shalt pitch it within, and without, with pitch. For God made Noah to know that an end of all Flesh was at hand, and that the Graves of the rebellious and cruel Generations were already fashioned in the Clouds, which soon after should swallow up and cover all living Creatures, which breathed in the Air: Noah and his Family excepted.

Joseph. l. 1. c. 4.

Gen. 6. 14.

v. 13.

But this universal Grave of Waters, and general Deluge hath not been received by all: for Divine Testimonies do not perswade all natural Men to those things, to which their own Reason cannot reach: dum obvoluta in obscuro veritas latet; whilst the truth lieth wrapped up in obscurity. Many there are who have disputed against the Universality of this overflowing, and have judged that this Flood of Noah fell but on some particular Places and Kingdoms: moved so to think, because in elder Ages there have been many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholaus Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Josephus, Est super Minyadam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes servos ejt diluvii tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca devectum in hujus vertice hasisse, ligno-rumque reliquias multo tempore conservatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam Moses Judæorum Legislator scribit: thus far this Author: There is (saith he) above Minyada (or the Country of Minye) an exceeding high Mountain in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were saved in the time of the Deluge; and that one was carried in an Ark, and rested upon the top of the Mountain, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof; and this might be the same, of which Moses the Law-giver of the Jews maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thalmudists (saith Annius) that many Giants saved themselves upon Mount Sion.

Lact. in Præf. de falsa relig.

Joseph. ant. l. 1. c. 4. Euseb. de præp. l. 9. c. 4.

But Berosus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howsoever he have been since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the general Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Ante aquarum cladem famosam, qua

universus periit Orbis, &c. Before that famous Destruction of Waters, by which the World universal perished: witnessing withal, that Noah, with his Wife Tirea, and his three Sons, with their Wives (in all eight persons) were only saved.

§. II.

Of the Flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noah's Flood.

BUT from the vanity of the Greeks, the corrupters of all Truth (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquity, came the errour first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perswade the World, that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bœotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore saith Rhodoginus, Ogygium id appellant Poëta tanquàm pervetus dixeris, ab Ogyge vetustissimo. The Poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges, the most ancient.

Rho. li. 15. c. 33.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he lived but in Jacob's time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses's time) and was born 67. Years after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he far later) as Rodoginus in the ninth Book of his Antiquities remembreth: Sint tamèn qui in Ægypto regnâsse autument hunc: unde sit Cadmus qui in Græciam profectus Thebas condidit, à bove jugulato sic nuncupatas; quoniàm Syrorum lingua Bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who think that this Ogyges did raign in Ægypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who travelling into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Beef slain: because in the Syrian Language a Beef is called Thebe.

Euseb. de prap evang. li. 10. ca. 3. Ca. 22.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the Year of the World 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Flood of Noah in the Year 2242, after the same account; and so there came 1200. Years between these Floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronology. Now although the very Year and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set down, but that there is a great difference among Writers, yet whosoever makes it most ancient, finds above 500. Years difference between that and the general Flood.

Li. 1. ca. 7.

For Paulus Orosius affirms, that this Tempest fell upon the Athenians but 1040. Years before Rome built. Bucholzerus saith it was 1043. elder then Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the Worlds Year 3219: though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reasons in the story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds Year 3280. Now the general Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. Years: and the Flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference between these two Floods must be 520. Years, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah Ogyges priscus, † as some do) it appears by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it self any further than the banks of Archipelago, or the Ægean Sea. For whereas Mela,* Pliny, and Solinus witness, that the City of Joppe in Judæa was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the weight of waters) their remained on certain Altars of Stone the title of the King, and of his brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure, it is no where found among Prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that ever the Flood of Ogyges spread it self over any part of Syria, much less over all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed up (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus) of which Ovid.

Ovid. Metam. li. 15. 303.

Si quaris Helicœn, & Buran, Achaidas urbes, Invenies sub aquis.

Bura and Helice on Achaian ground
Are sought in vain, but under Sea are found.

Of this Flood of Ogyges was invented the Table of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the Daughter of Cœus, the Son of Titan, being beloved and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with Child; Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be delivered on; and withal caused the monstrous Serpent Python to follow and affright her, whersoever she travailed, till at length arriving at the Isle of Ortygia she was there received: in which she was delivered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins; whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his Reign) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and fogs, that in Attica, and along the Coasts of the Ægean Sea, neither the beams, of the Sun by day, nor of the Moon by night could pierce the Air, or be perceived by the Inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these Vapours dissipated) the Air began to be clear, and the people of Ortygia espied the light of the Moon somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sun also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moon, and Apollo the Sun, they were reported to be born in the Isle of Ortygia thereof afterwards called Delos: which signifieth manifestation.

Nat. Com. li. 1. ca. 6.

Plin. li. 2. c. 12.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Flood of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories have reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the Air sensibly discerned in those parts, and some unusual face of the skies. Varro in his Books De gente populi Romani (as he is cited by S. Augustine) reporteth out of Castor, that so great a miracle happened in the Star of Venus, as never was seen before, nor in after times: For the colour, the greatness, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out as Adrastus Cyzicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Aug. de civ. Dei, li. 21. ca. 8.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I do not remember, that I have any where read, of so good Astrologers flourishing among the Greeks, or elsewhere in those days, as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets so exact, that it should need no reformation. Of the colour and magnitude. I see no reason why the difference found in the Star of Venus should be held miraculous; considering that lesser mists and fogs, than those which covered Greece with so long Darkness, do familiarly present our Senses, with as great alterations in the Sun and Moon. That the figure should vary, questionless it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigy: for it stands well with good reason, that that the ſide of Venus which the Sun beholds, being enlightened by him, the oppoſite half ſhould remain ſhadowed; whereby that Planet, would unto our eyes, deſcrying only that part whereon the light falleth, appear to be horned, as the Moon doth ſeem; if diſtance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehenſion of our Senſes.

Galilæus a worthy Aſtrologer now living, who by the help of perſpective Glaſſes hath found in the Stars many things unknown to the Ancients, affirmeth ſo much to have been diſcovered in Venus by his late Obſervations. Whether ſome watery diſpoſition of the Air might preſent as much to them that lived with Ogyges, as Galilæus hath ſeen through his inſtrument; I cannot tell: ſure I am, that the diſcovery of a truth formerly unknown, doth rather convince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of St. Auguſtine) accompanied with ſuch unuſual (and therefore the more dreadful, though natural) Signs teſtifying the concurrence of Cauſes with Effects in that Inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah which was general and altogether miraculous, may ſeem to have had no other token, or foreſhewing, than the long preaching of Noah himſelf, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came ſudainly, and took them all away. Luke 17. v. 27.

§. III.

Of Deucalion's Flood: and that this was not Noah's Flood: nor the Umbri in Italy a remnant of any univerſal Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certain, was that of Deucalion in Theſſalia, of which St. Auguſtine out of Varro. His temporibus (ut Varro ſcribit) regnante Athenienſibus Cranao, ſucceſſore Cecropis (ut autem noſtri, Euſebius & Hieronymus) adhuc eodem Cecrope permanente, Diluvium fuit, quod appellatum eſt Deucalionis: (that is) In theſe times (as Varro reporteth) Cranaus the ſucceſſour of Cecrops governing the Athenians, or (as our Euſebius and Hierome ſay) Cecrops yet living, that Flood (called Deucalion's )happened.

And in the beginning of the eleventh Chapter of the ſame eighteenth Book, he uſeth theſe words. Eduxit ergo Moſes ex Ægypto populum Dei noviſſimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium Regis, cum apud Aſſyrios regnaret Aſcatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Triopas. Moſes led the people of God out of Ægypt about the latter times of Cecrops King of the Athenians, Aſcatades reigning over the Aſſyrians, over the Scyonians Marathus, and over the Argives Triopas: ſo as leaving the curioſity of a few Years, more or leſs, it appeareth, that this Flood of Deucalion was either at the egreſſion of the Children of Iſrael out of Ægypt, or near it: and then after Noah 753. Years, according to Funckius, who makes Cecrops to live in the Year of the World 2409. or if we follow Mercator, then 739. Years after Noah, and in the Year of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were born in the Age of the World 2356. according to Codoman; then giving unto Deucalion forty Years of Age when this Flood happened, it falleth within one Year of Mercator's account. But Deucalion by all approved Hiſtorians is ſaid to have been 82. Years old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Flood of Deucalion, and the Conflagration and burning in Phaëton's time, by the raign of Crotopus King of the Argives; but Crotopus lived King of the Argives ſix Years after Iſrael departed Ægypt, which makes twenty Years difference according to Funckius, who will have this Flood and burning to have fallen fourteen Years before Moſes left Ægypt: for he gave of the Worlds Years to the Flood and burning the Year 2440. and to Moſes his egreſſion the Year 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks that Moſes was more ancient, and lived with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaëton, preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denyed by all: for that of Theſſaly (called Deucalion's) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at leaſt 250. Years or thereabouts. Euſebius in his Chronology makes it 230. and ſo doth P. Oroſius: Euſebius about the 50. Year of Moſes's life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noah's Flood 770. Years: for theſe be Clemens Alexandrinus his words. Fuit autem in Græcia tempore quidem Phoronei, qui fuit poſt Inachum, inundatio quæ fuit tempore Ogygis: There happened in Greece in the time of Phoroneus, who lived after Inachus the Flood of Ogyges. Now if the Flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. Years before the firſt Olympiad, according to Euſebius and Oroſius; (as before) then is it manifeſt, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out that Ogyges Flood happened before the Hebrews left Ægypt 250. Years, or 260. Years, according to the difference between the Opinions of Euſebius and Oroſius. And for my ſelf (who rather follow thoſe Chronologers, which give 60. Years more to Abraham after the Flood, than the reſt) I reckon the times which come between theſe Floods in this ſort. The general Flood was in the Year of the World 1656. Jacob was born in the Year of the World 2169. ſo as from the beginning of the Flood to Jacob's birth there were conſumed 513. Years. Ogyges Flood happened 100 Years after Jacob was born; and therefore after the general Flood 613. Years. Now Deucalion was born in the Year of the World 2356. and had lived 82. Years, when his Kingdom of Theſſaly was overwhelmed; (which added to 2356. make 2438) his Flood was after Noah's Flood ended 782. Years. And hereto Annius his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. Years between the general Flood and Deucalion's birth; to which add 82. Years of his Age (as before) and then the Flood of Theſſaly followed the general 782. Years. The words of that Xenophon are theſe. Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, ſecundo anno Sphæri, ſeptingenti ſupputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Theſſaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalion, in the ſecond Year of Sphærus are numbred 700 Years, and when Deucalion was 82 Years old, he ſaw Theſſalia drowned. This Flood happened in the Winter time about Parnaſſus; witneſs Ariſtotle in the firſt of his Meteors. And Varro (whom St. Auguſtine ſo often citeth for his excellent learning, eſpecially in Antiquities) findeth this Flood of Deucalion to have happened in the time of Cranaus, who ſucceeded Cecrops: Oroſius thinks it ſomewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Only this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only over Theſſaly it ſelf, and the Regions adjoyning Weſtward; but it covered the greateſt part of Italy: and either the ſame, or ſome other particular Flood then happening oppreſt Ægypt, ſaith Euſebius. And therefore did the Greeks either think it, or fain it to be univerſal; and Deucalion, then King, ſaving himſelf and ſome others on the Mountains of Theſſaly (of all other the higheſt, ſaith Solinus) was by reaſon thereof (as Strabo witneſſeth) ſaid to be the preſerver of Mankind.

kind. That this Flood covered a great part of Italy, Pliny and Solinus make it probable: who affirm that the People then inhabiting Italy were therefore called Ὀμβριοι quia ab imbribus diluvii superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Book, and Trezenius in his second: which Umbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutii, and all others inhabiting anciently the Banks of the Mediterrane Sea. But that these Umbri were not the Inhabiters of Italy before the Flood of Noah, and so took name by saving themselves upon the Appenine Mountains, the Scriptures teach us: shewing who, and who only then were preserved, which is sufficient. Report hath adventured further, telling us that the first People which after the general Flood inhabited Italy, were the Camesenes; (so named from Camese, whom Cato in originibus, another of Annius his Authors, names for a Consort of Janus) which People lived altogether a savage Life; till such time as Saturn arriving on those Coasts, devised Laws to govern them by; the memory of whose acts in that Region Diodore and Thallus among the Greeks, Nepos Cassius and Varro among the Latins have preserved; and of whom Virgil;

Saturn descending from the Heavens high,
Fearing the Arms of Jupiter his Son,
His Kingdom lost, and banisht thence doth fly.
Rude People on the Mountain tops he won
To live together, and by Laws: which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones, and after them of the Sicani: Nations, which again sought to displant the ancient Inhabiters:

Virg. l. 8. Æn.

Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venêre Sicani.
Then came th' Ausonian bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spain and sate down in Italy) Thucydides and Pliny give testimony: who were again expelled by the Ligii, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations and replantations came the Umbri, descended of the Galles (saith Annius) not of those Galles of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italy, even all Hetruria and Campania, as Herodotus, Pliny, and Dionysius, have assured us; and therefore this Flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italy, and dispossest of Italy again, before the Umbri were ever heard of, or had being. So that Kingdom was first called Camasene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Ausonia, then Sicania, before the Umbri (in whose time Deucalion's Flood happened) possest the same, about 306. Years before the War of Troy: Lycaon then governing Arcadia; who being the Father of two and twenty Sons, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italy, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held until Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italy, after his own name, about 250. Years before the fall of Troy. After these came the Pelasgi, of whom Pliny in his third Book and fifth Chapter; and Strabo in his fifth; Thucydides in his sixth speaks at large: and after them the Lydi under Tyrrhenus their Captain, that gave name to the Tyrrheni; who casting thence the Umbri, took from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelve Cities; to which (after they had possest and past over the Appenine Mountains) they added divers others, whereof Telsina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation, as these Umbri, in those parts, I do not affirm: having respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was derived from the Greek word Ombros; but that these Umbri of Italy were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter.

§. IV.

Of some other Records testifying the universal Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Ægypt: and of some elsewhere

SAint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth that the Greeks and Latins made not any mention of the universal Flood, because they had nothing of Antiquity foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus before remembred) were all things among the Greeks (which Antiquity had worn out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (wormeaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did every Family which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of divine letters was not received, find no parent of more Antiquity, than such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their own; and as the Grecians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigenæ, and growing out of the Earth, or invent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldæans had certain knowledge of Noah's Flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirm by hearsay, that some Giants saved themselves upon the Mountains Baris in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authority approved: using the word sermo est, that such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the Ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth that Sisithrus to preserve himself from a Flood foretold him by Saturnus, fled to the hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian navigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the Waters were fallen) sent forth Birds, that finding no Land to rest on, returned again; which he also did a second time, but at the third return the Birds feet were covered with Mud and Slime. To this effect are Eusebius's words out of Abydenus, which may seem a true description (though in other terms) of Noah's Flood.

Euseb. de præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 4.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this general Flood. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Ægyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Books of Ægypt, the Story of the Flood universal, which (saith he) happened long before the Grecian Inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third Flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, some what more ancient than that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the general Flood for the first, which happened (saith he) under the old Ogyges, sub prisca Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then living, 44. Years before that of Attica, in the the 34. Year of Belochus King of the Assyrians, though I do not believe him as touching the time. But this Flood covered a great part of the nether Ægypt, especially all that Region subject to Prometheus; and hereof came the Fable of the Vultur on Prometheus his Liver, afterward slain by Hercules of Ægypt: which Fiction Diod. Siculus delivereth in these words: Fluvium propter cursus velocitatem, profunditatemque aquarum Aquilam tunc appellatum, Herculem cum consilii magnitudine, tum virtute, volunt è vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum convertisse: Unde & Græci quidam Poeta rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, Herculem tradunt Aquilam Promethei jecur depascentem occidisse. This Flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftness of his course, as also for the depth, was in those days called the Eagle: but Hercules by his great judgment and Vertue did again compress and straighten this River so far extended and overspread, turning it into the old channels: Whence certain Greek Poets (converting this labour and work of Hercules into a Fable) devised that Hercules slew the Eagle, which fed on Prometheus's Liver; meaning that he delivered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the loss of his People and Country (by the waters destroyed and covered over) he suffered.

Nat. com. l. 4. c. 6.

A fourth Flood chanced about Pharus in Ægypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiveth out of his Xenophon, who in this brief sort writeth of all these Inundations. Inundationes plures fuere: prima novimestris Inundatio terrarum sub prisco Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith the same Xenophon) the first which was universal of nine Months, and this happened under the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one Months continuance in the time of Hercules and Prometheus Ægyptians: a third of two Months under Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three Months in Thessalia under Deucalion; and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) under Proteus of Ægypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth book and eleventh Chapter, taking the Samothraces for his Authors, remembreth a Flood in Asia the less and elsewhere, of no less destruction than any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion: the Sea of Pontus and Hellespont breaking in over the Land.

Xenop. de æquiv. Comm. per Annium. fol. 37.

But there have been many Floods in divers times, and ages, not inferiour to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Ægypt: as in the Year of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same Year, Gregory then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a marvailous overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian Territory, and in Liguria, accompanied with a most fearful storm of Thunder and Lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome by reason of the many dead Serpents cast up and left upon the Land, after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the Year 1446. there perished 10000. People by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordroch in Holland: of which kind I take that Flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that and in the Year 1238. Trithemius speaketh of an Earthquake which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a Flood in Friseland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Sigog. in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italy, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicily were swallowed: another in the Papacy of Alexander the sixth: also in the Year 1515. Maximilian being Emperour. He also remembreth a perilous overflowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many People perished. Likewise Viginier a French Historian speaketh of a great Flood in the South part of Languedoc which fell in the Year of our Lord 1557. with so dreadful a Tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World and Judgement day; saying, that by the violent descent of the waters from the Mountains, about Nismes there were removed divers old heaps and Mountures of Ground, and many other places torn up and rent: by which accident there was found both coyn of Silver and Gold, divers Pieces of Plate, and vessels of other Metal, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths invaded that Province, in the Year 1156.

§. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernatural, though some say it might have been foreseen by the Stars.

NOW howsoever all these Floods and many other, which have covered at several times several Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I have learned of some ancient Southsayers among them) may be ascribed to natural causes and accidents; yet that universal Flood (in the time of Noah) was poured over the whole face of the Earth by a power above Nature, and by the especial commandment of God himself, who at that time gave strength of influence to the Stars, and abundance to the Fountains of the Deep: whereby the irruption of waters was made more forcible, than any ability of Nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoever union could perform, without receiving from the Fountain of all power, strength, and faculties supernatural. Henricus Mecliniensis, a Scholar of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Albu Masar observeth, that before the Flood of Noah, the like Conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that Constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Flood of Noah might be foretold, because Cancer is both a watery Sign, and the House of the Moon, which is the Lady of the Sea, and of moisture, according to the rules of Astronomy, and common experience. And this Opinion Petrus de Aliaco upon Genesis confirmeth, affirming that although Noah did well know this Flood by divine revelation, yet (this Conjunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only Signs, but also working causes, by strength received from the first cause, which is God himself: and further that by * Cataractæ cœli (Englished the windores of Heaven) Moses meant this great and watery conjunction; the word [Cataractæ] signifying flowing down or coming down. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordain by the course of the Heavens such a Constellation, by which all Men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked ways wherein they walked, and call unto God for Mercy.

Also de Concordia Theolog. & Astrolog.

Gen. 7. 11.

* The word καταῤῥάκτης properly signifieth any place of stoppage, against which the force of the water being naturally carried downwards, dasheth and breaketh; of ἀράσσω allido, or frango. Hence, because windores do not only open but also shut, the word hath been expounded (Windores) for Bars or Flood Gates.

Of this judgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who understood that the words Catarractæ cœli, or windores of Heaven were to be taken for the former Conjunction, or for these watery Signs, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion, and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Moon: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His own words are these, Nondum intelligo Prophetam Hebræorum catarractas cœli vocâsse, nisi partes illas cœli, quæ generativæ sunt Pluviarum & Inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceive not what the Prophet of the Hebrews meaneth by those words, [Catarractæ cœli, or, Windows of Heaven] unless he thereby understand those Cœlestial Powers, by whose influences are engendered the Rain, and Inundations of Waters, such as are the watery Signs of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his unsearchable Wisdom this Conjunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) add vigour and faculty, and gave to every operation increase of Vertues, violent Eruptions to Springs and Fountains, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heap of their Waters; taking retention from the Clouds, and condensing Air into Water by the Ministery of his Angels, or howsoever else best pleased his All-powerfulness.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the universal Flood: and what are Catarractæ Cœli Gen. 7. vers. 11.

NOW if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seventh day; (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which granted, it may seem that then all the Earth and Air had not Waters sufficient to cover the habitable World fifteen Cubits above the highest Mountains. Of this Proposition, Whether God hath so restrained himself or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to overcover the highest Mountains, I take that conceit to be unlearned and foolish: for it is written, that the Fountains of the great Deep were broken up (that is) the waters forsook the very Bowels of the Earth; and all whatsoever was dispersed therein, pierced and brake through the Face thereof. Then let us consider that the Earth had above one and twenty thousand Miles: the Diameter of the Earth according to that Circle seven thousand Mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred Miles: Take then the highest Mountain of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the Mountains of Armenia or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tennerif, and I do not find, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth above thirty miles upright. It is not then impossible, answering Reason with Reason, that all those Waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred Miles deep should not well help to cover the space of thirty Miles in height, this thirty Miles upright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and sixteen times: for the Fountains of the great Deep were broken up, and the waters drawn out of the Bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Air over and above it, we shall find the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Air as every-where compasseth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conversion of Air into water, a change familiar in those Elements, it will not seem strange to Men of Judgment, yea but of ordinary understanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was covered over with Waters without any new Creation.

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Aliacensis, to which I may add Berosus and others, That such a Conjunction there was, foreshewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Catarractæ Cœli, or Windows of Heaven, was meant this Conjunction; there needs no other answer than that Observation of Ludovicus Vives, who affirmeth that by the gravest Astrologians it was observed, that in the Year 1524. there should happen the like Conjunction, as at Noah's Flood, than which (saith he) there was never a more fair, dry, and seasonable Year: the like destruction was prophesied of the Year 1588. But Picus Earl of Mirandula proveth that there could not be any such Conjunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mystery in the word Catarractæ Cœli, than that the Clouds were meant thereby: Moses using the word Windows of Heaven (if that be the sense of the word) to express the violence of the Rains, and pouring down of Waters. For whosoever hath seen those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spouts (where Clouds do not break into drops, but fall with a resistless violence in one body) may properly use that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windows or Flood-Gates of Heaven opened: (which is) That Waters fell, contrary to Custom, and that order which we call Natural. God then loosened the Power retentive in the uppermost Air; and the Waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith Job) he which holdeth the waters, and they dry up; or better in Latin, Et omnia siccantur, And all things are dried up; but when he sendeth them out, they destroy the Earth: and in the 26. Chapter, He bindeth the waters in the Clouds; but these bonds God loosed at that time of the general Flood, and called up the Waters which slept in the great Deep: and these joyning together covered the Earth, till they had performed the work of his will: which done, he then commanded them to return into their dark and vast Caves, and the rest (by a Wind) rarified again into Air, formerly condensed into Drops.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

NOAH commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entred the Ark which he had built, with his own Wife, and his Sons, and his Sons Wives, taking with them of every Creature, which took life by generation, seven of the clean, and of the unclean, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth quietness: after others, and according to the Prophecy of his Father Lamech, cessation; to whom after-times gave many names answering his Antiquity, Zeal, Vertue and other qualities: as, The first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was also a great Flood of Achaia: Saturn they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gave him the name of Prometheus, who was said to steal away Jupiter's Fire; Fire in that place being taken and understood for the knowledge of God and Heavenly things. Others think that he was so called for his excellent Wisdom and foresight. He had also the name of Janus, (id est) vinosus, because Jain, signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian finds him written in libris ritualibus, in the Books of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturn, Uranus, and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time than all the other ancientest feigned Gods. And this name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latin: for it was in use before there was any Latin Nation, or any Kingdom

Kingdom by that name known. Of the Antiquity of Janus, Fabius Pictor giveth this Teſtimony. Jani ætate nulla erat Monarchia, quid mortalibus pectoribus nondum hæſerat ulla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & ſar primus populos docuit Janus ad ſacrificia: primus enim aras & Pomœria & ſacra docuit. In the time of Janus (ſaith he) there was no Monarchy: for the deſire of rule had not then folded it ſelf about the hearts of Men. Janus firſt taught the People to ſacrifice Wine and Meal: he firſt ſet up Altars, inſtituted Gardens and ſolitary Groves, wherein they uſed to pray; with other Holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater Teſtimony than this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeth ſo well with the Scriptures. For firſt, whilſt Noah flouriſhed, there was not any King or Monarch: Nimrod being the firſt that took on him Sovereign Authority. Secondly, Noah after the Flood was the firſt that planted
Gen. 9. 20. the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the Firſt-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meal. Thirdly, he was the firſt that raiſed
Gen. 8. 20. an Altar, and offered Sacrifice to God, a Thankſgiving for his Merciful goodneſs towards him. Noah was alſo ſignified in the name of Biſrons (which was given to Janus) becauſe he beheld the times both before and after the Flood, quia præterita noverit, & futura proſpexerit, ſaith Arnobius.
Arn. cont. gent. l. 6. Becauſe he knew what was paſt, and provided for what was to come. He was alſo in the Perſon of Janus ſhadowed by the name of Chaos, and ſemen Orbis, the Seed of the World; becauſe as out of that confuſed heap was drawn all the kinds of Beaſts and Plants: ſo from Noah came all Mankind: whereof Ovid in the Perſon of Janus:

Ovid. de faſtis. l. 1.

Me Chaos antiqui (nam ſum res priſca) vocabant, Aſpice quam longi temporis acta cano.

The ancient call'd me Chaos: my great Years
By thoſe old times, of which I ſing, appears.

He was alſo intituled Cœlum and Sol, Heaven and the Sun, for his excellent knowledge in Aſtronomy: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus, and Alex. Aphrodiſeus ſo call, becauſe he was the reſtorer of the Greeks to their former Liberty, but in reſpect of the Flood. For the Greeks called Liber Τὸν ὑν, and his Nurſes Hyades, of Rain, becauſe Noah entred the Ark, when the Sun joyned with the Stars Hyades, a Conſtellation in the brow or neck of Taurus, and ever after a Monument of Noah's Flood. He was alſo by others ſurnamed Triton, a Marine God, the Son of Neptune: becauſe he lived in ſafety on the Waters. So was he known by the name of Dionyſus, quaſi
Nat. Com. l. 5. c. 13. Διανυσσων, mentem pungens, bite-brain, or wit-ſtinger, though Diodorus conceive otherwiſe, and derive that name à patre & loco, of his Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Jove, and Niſa a Town of Arabia Cælius. Fœlix, ſaith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had alſo the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; becauſe he
Gen. 9. 20. firſt yoked Oxen and tilled the Ground, according to that of Moſes. And Noah became an husbandman. Now howſoever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwiſe Dionyſus) it is certain that the name was borrowed, and the invention ſtollen from Noah. But this name of Bacchus, more anciently Baachus, was taken (ſaith Gul. Stuckius, and out of Stuck. in libris conviv. & Danæus de prima Noachi ætate. him Danæus) from Noachus, [N] being changed into [B]; and it is the more probable, becauſe it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the firſt Planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of Noah (the firſt and ancient Bacchus) were all thoſe Fables deviſed, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Book, and fifth Chapter. This firſt Bacchus (to wit) Noah was ſurnamed Nyſius of the Mountain Nyſa in India, where the Grecian Bacchus never came, whatſoever themſelves feign of his Enterpriſes; and theſe Mountains of Nyſa joyn with thoſe of Paropaniſus, and thoſe other Eaſtern Mountains, on which the Ark of Noah reſted after the Flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memory of this ſecond Parent of Mankind might the better be preſerved, there were founded by his Iſſues many great Cities which bare his name; with many Rivers and Mountains: which oftentimes forgat that it was done in his regard, becauſe the many names given him brought the ſame confuſion to places as to himſelf. Notwithſtanding all which, we find the City of Noah upon the banks of the red Sea and elſewhere: the River of Nous in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolomy Danus; dividing Illyria from Panonia. Thus much for the name.

§ VIII.

Of ſundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made, the matter, faſhion and name.

NOW in what part of the World Noah built the Ark, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neither do I find any approved Author that hath written thereof: only Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Scythia conceiverh, that Noah built his Ark near the Mountains of Caucaſus, becauſe on thoſe Hills are found the goodlieſt Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon. made the War among a People, called Nyſæi, inhabiting the other ſide of Caucaſus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchers wrought over with Cedar. To this place (ſaith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to ſeparate himſelf from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled againſt God and Nature, as alſo becauſe he would not be interrupted in the Building of the Ark; to which alſo he addeth the conveniency of Rivers, to tranſport the Timber which he uſed, without troubling any other Carriages.

Only this we are ſure of, that the Ark was built in ſome part of the Eaſtern World; and to my underſtanding, not far from the place where it reſted after the Flood. For Noah did not uſe any Maſt or Sail (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Ark no otherwiſe move than the Hulk or Body of a Ship doth in a calm Sea. Alſo becauſe it is not probable, that during theſe continual and downright Rains there were any Winds at all, therefore was the Ark little moved from the place where it was faſhioned and ſet together. For it is written: God made a wind to paſs upon the earth, and
Gen. 8. 1. the waters ceaſed; and therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storm or forcible Wind at all, which could drive the Ark any great diſtance from the place where it was firſt by the Waters liſted up. This is alſo the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Ark had fundum planum; a flat bottom, and not raiſed in form of a Ship with a ſharpneſs forward, to cut the Waves for the better ſpeed.

This kind of Veſſel the Hebrews call Thebet, and the Greeks Larnax, for ſo they termed Deucalion's Ship: and ſome ſay, that the Hill Parnaſſus, to which in eight days he arrived, was firſt called Larnaſſus, and by the change of [L] into [P] Parnaſſus; but Pauſanias thinks that it took name of a Steph. de urb. fol. 227. Son of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnaſſus, the Inventor of Auguration.

Pencerus

De Oracul. fol. 94. Peucerus finds the word [Parnassus] to have no affinity with the Greek, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Nahas, which signifieth Auguration and Divination: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Leaf before cited.

Epiph. in Ancor. Josephus calls the Ark Machina, by the general name of a huge Frame: and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew Aron; but herein lieth the difference between Aron and Thebet, That Aron signifieth properly the Ark of the Sanctuary, but Thebet such a Vessel as swimmeth, and beareth it self upon the Waters.

Lastly, this Ark of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship in this, That it had a Cover and Roof, with a Crest in the midst thereof, and the Sides declining like the Roof of an House, to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himself and his Children might shelter, Gen. 6. 4. and separate themselves from the noysomness of the many Beasts, which filled the other Rooms and Parts of the Ark.

Of what Wood the Ark was built it is uncertain. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place only used is diversly understood; and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneva Translation calls it Pine-tree, the Rabbine Cedar, the Seventy square Timber, the Latin smooth Timber. Others will have it Cypress-trees, as dedicated to the Dead, because Cypress is worn at Funerals. But out of doubt if the word Gopher signifie any special kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the Voice of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the Wood, having the Promise of God, and his Grace and Mercy for his defence. V. 18. For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plin. l. 16. c. 40. Pliny affirmeth, That in Ægypt it was the use to build Ships of Cedar, which the Worms eat not; and he avoweth that he saw in Utica, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar Beams, laid in the time of the Foundation of the City, and that they were still found in his time, which was above 1188. Years after: proving thereby, that this kind of Wood was not subject to putrifying or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carry, and of a sweet savour, lasting also better than any other Wood, and because near the place where the Ark rested, there are found great store of these Cedar-trees, as also in all the Mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Ark might be of that Wood: which hath besides the other Commodities the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build Ships withal. Pererius conceiveth that the Ark had divers sorts of Timber, and that the Bottom had of one sort, the Deck and Partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in general. True it is, that Cedar will serve for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and heighth, and to the partitions of the Ark; and to pitch it, and to divide it into Cabins, thereby to sever the clean Beasts from the unclean, and to preserve their several sorts of Food; and that it might be capable of all kind of living Creatures, according to the Numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God, who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without the help of a Compass or the North-star. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have been a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is Pererius. great quantity about the Valley of Sodom and Gomorrha, now the dead Sea or Asphaltes: and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India, and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sun, but by the Fire only, after the manner of hard Wax.

That the Ark was of sufficient capacity.

THE Ark according to Gods Commandment had of length three hundred Cubits, fifty of breadth, and thirty deep or high: by which proportion it had six parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. Augustine, Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc sæculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesiæ, quæ sit salva per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Christus Jesus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisque ejus significat corpus humanum, in cujus veritate ad homines prænunciatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a Figure of the City of God, travelling in this World as a stranger (that is) of the Church, saved by the Tree whereupon the Mediator between God and Man, the Man Jesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, heighth, and breadth, answereth the shape of Mans Body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed. De Civit. Dei, l. 15. c. 26.

By what kind of Cubit the Ark was measured, it hath been a disputed Question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the Common) containeth one Foot and a half, measured from the sharp of the Elbow to the point of the middle Finger. The second (the Palm Cubit) which taketh one handful more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three Inches. The fourth is the Sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly there is a fifth Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth six common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of Mens Statures hath made the difference. For as there is now a less proportion of Bodies: so is the common Cubit, from the sharp of the Elbow to the point of the middle Finger, of less length than it was in elder times.

S. Augustine considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Ark held, with their Food and Water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Ark had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost six of the common. For measuring the Ark by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacity of that Vessel built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolomy Philo-pater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his Judgment as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all sorts of Creatures by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needful to take any kinds of Fishes into the Ark, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their own Element. Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca quæ possent in aquis vivere; non solùm mersa sicut pisces, verùm supernatantia, sicut multa alites. It was not needful to conserve those Creatures in the Ark, which could live in the Waters; and not only Fishes, which can live under Water, but also those Fowls which sit and swim on them: And again, Terra non aqua, maledicta, quia Adam Athen. deipnosop. lib. 4. Plutar. in vita Demetrii. Aug. de Civit. lib. 1. c. 27.

non hujus, ſed illius fructum vetitum comedit. It was the Earth, and not the Waters, which God curſed: for of the forbidden Fruit of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did Adam eat; ſo as S. Auguſtine gathereth hereupon, (as aforeſaid) that ſo huge a Frame needed not.

And if we look with the Eyes of Judgment hereunto, we ſhall find nothing monſtrous therein; although the imaginations of Men, who (for the moſt part) have more of miſchief and of ignorance, than of any reverend reaſon, find many impoſſibilities in this Work of God. But it is manifeſt, and undoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now ſeem differing and of ſeveral kinds, were not then in rerum natura. For thoſe Beaſts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that Age, or elſe it was not needful to preſerve them: ſeeing they might be generated again by others, as the Mules, the Hyæna's and the like: the one begotten by Aſſes and Mares, the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by diſcovering of ſtrange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beaſts and Birds differing in Colour or Stature from thoſe of theſe Northern parts, it may be ſuppoſed by a ſuperficial conſideration, that all thoſe which wear Red and Pyed Skins, or Feathers, are differing from thoſe that are leſs painted, and were plain Ruſſet or Black: they are much miſtaken that ſo think. And for my own Opinion I find no difference, but only in Magnitude, between the Cat of Europe, and the Ounce of India; and even thoſe Dogs which are become wild in Hiſpagniola, with which the Spaniards uſed to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to deſtroy the breed of their Cattle, and do alſo oftentimes tear aſunder their own Children. The common Crow and Rook of India is full of red Feathers in the drown'd and low Iſlands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thruſh hath his Feathers mixt with Black and Carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog Fiſh of England is the Shark of the South Ocean: For if Colour or Magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which we call the Black-moors, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but ſome kind of ſtrange Beaſts: and ſo the Giants of the South America ſhould be of another kind, than the People of this part of the World. We alſo ſee it daily that the Natures of Fruits are changed by tranſplantation, ſome to better, ſome to worſe, eſpecially with the change of Climate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often Grafting, and the beſt Mellons will change in a Year or two to common Cucumbers by being ſet in a barren Soil: Therefore taking the kinds preciſely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced: The Ark, after the meaſure of the common Cubit was ſufficiently capacious to contain of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we add but half a Foot of meaſure to the common Cubit, which had a Foot and a half of Giantly Stature (and leſs allowance we cannot give to the difference between them and us) then did the Ark contain 600 Foot in length, and 100 Foot in breadth, and 60 Foot deep.

Acoſt. hiſt. India.

But firſt of all to make it manifeſt, that the Geometrical Cubit is not uſed in the Scripture, the Stature of the Giants therein named may ſuffice. For if the Bed of Og King of Baſan had been nine Geometrical Cubits long, it had taken 54 Cubits of the common, which make 80 Foot: and Goliah, who had the length of 6 Cubits and a handful, (which makes nine Foot and a handful, a proportion credible) if theſe Cubits had been Geometrical, they had been 54 Foot in heighth and upwards, which were monſtrous and moſt incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the Head of Goliah been nine Foot long, and far weightier and bigger than all David's Body, who carried it away.

Deut. 3. 11.

1 Sam. 17. 4.

Again if the Geometrical Cubit had been uſed for a meaſure in the Scripture, as many Commenters have obſerved, then had the Altar (appointed to contain five Cubits of length, five of breadth and three of heighth) have reached the length of 27 Foot upright, and ſo muſt their Prieſts have aſcended by Steps or Ladders to have performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrary to Gods Commandment given in theſe words: Thou ſhalt not go up with ſteps unto mine altar, that thy ſhame be not diſcovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high which make four Foot, that their Prieſts ſtanding thereby might execute their office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinary Cubit of one Foot and a half, according to the Meaſure of Giantly Stature; which Meaſure (doubtleſs) might give much the more capacity to the Ark, although it be alſo probable, that as the Men were, ſo were the Horſes whereon they rode, and all other Creatures of a correſpondent ſize. And yet (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Ark, it were not hard to conceive, how all the diſtinct Species of Animals, whoſe Lives cannot be preſerved in the Waters, might according to their preſent quantities be contained in a Veſſel of thoſe Dimenſions which the Ark had; allowing to the Cubit one Foot and a half of our now uſual Meaſure: whence it followeth of neceſſity, that thoſe large Bodies which were in the days of Noah might have room ſufficient in the Ark, which was meaſured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

Exod. 20. 26.

How the appointed number of Creatures, to be ſaved (that is) ſeven of the clean, two of the unclean (with neceſſary Food) might have place in the Ark, Buteo hath very learnedly declared: the brief ſumm of whoſe Diſcourſe to that purpoſe is this: The length of the Ark was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty Cubits, and the Product by the heighth of thirty Cubits, ſheweth the whole Concavity to have been 450000. Now whereas the Poſts, Walls, and other Partitions of Lodgings may ſeem to have taken up a great part of the hollow: the heighth of the Roof which (the Perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500 cubical Cubes, was a ſufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of ſuch greatneſs we ſeek room for 89 diſtinct Species of Beaſts, or (leſt any ſhould be omitted) for 100 ſeveral kinds, we ſhall eaſily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bigneſs are no way anſwerable to them, and for Meat to ſuſtain them all. For there are three ſorts of Beaſts, whoſe Bodies are of a quantity beſt known; the Beef, the Sheep, and the Wolf: to which the reſt may be reduced, by ſaying, (according to Ariſtotle) that one Elephant is anſwerable to four Beeves, one Lyon to two Wolves, and ſo of the reſt. Of Beaſts, ſome feed on Vegetables, others on Fleſh. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater ſort, feeding on Vegetables: of which number, only three are clean, according to the Law of Moſes, whereof ſeven of a kind entred into the Ark, namely three couples for Breed, and one odd one for Sacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kind, ſo that in all there were in the Ark one and twenty great Beaſts clean, and ſix and fifty unclean, eſtimable for largeneſs as 91 Beeves; yet for a ſupplement (leſt perhaps perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued, as 120 Beeves. Of the leſſer ſort, feeding on Vegetables, were in the Ark ſix and twenty kinds, eſtimable with good allowance for ſupply, as fourſcore Sheep. Of thoſe which devour Fleſh were two and thirty kinds, anſwerable to threeſcore and four Wolves. All theſe 280 Beaſts might be kept in one Story or Room of the Ark in their ſeveral Cabbins; their Meat in a ſecond: the Birds and their Proviſion in a third, with place to ſpare for Noah and his Family, and all their neceſſaries.

§. X.

That the Ark reſted upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucaſus) between the Eaſt Indies, and Scythia.

†. I.

A Preteritian of ſome Queſtions leſs material: with a Note of the uſe of this Queſtion, to find out the Metropolis of Nations.

WHAT time Noah took to build the Ark, I leave to others to diſpute; but he received the Commandment from God 100 Years before the Waters fell: and had therefore choice of time and leiſure ſufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into four, S. Auguſtine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controverſie: or whether thoſe Creatures which ſometimes reſt on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartos) the Sea-Cows or Sea-Horſes, were kept in the Ark, or no, I think it a needleſs curioſity; and yet to this ſaith Pererius, and others before him, that a Fiſh-Pool might be made as well within the Ark, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuſe. Laſtly, to conſider or labour to diſprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who ſuppoſe that the Ark was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Cryſtal to receive in Light, and keep out Water, were but to revive the buried Vanities of former times. But that which I ſeek moſt to ſatisfie my ſelf and others in, is in what part of the World the Ark reſted after the Flood: becauſe the true underſtanding of ſome of theſe places (as the Seat of the Terreſtrial Paradiſe, and the reſting of the Ark) do only and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all Story, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better underſtood.

†. II.

A Propoſal of the common Opinion, that the Ark reſted upon ſome of the Hills of Armenia.

AND firſt, for the true place where the Ark reſted after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah travelled to their firſt Settlement and Plantation, I am reſolved (without any preſumption) that therein the moſt Writers were utterly miſtaken. And I am not led ſo to think out of my humour or newneſs of opinion, or ſingularity; but do herein ground my ſelf on the Original and firſt Truth, which is the Word of God, and after that upon Reaſon, and the moſt probable circumſtances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Ark ſtayed upon one of the mountains of Ararat, which the Chaldaan Paraphraſt hath converted Kardu, meaning the Hills Gordei or Gordiei in Armenia the greater: (as the words Gordai and Kardu ſeem to be one and the ſame) of which Opinion alſo the moſt of our Interpreters are; I find neither Scripture nor Reaſon which teacheth any ſuch thing: (to wit) that it reſted on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damaſcenus calls this Mountain of Ararat, Baris, being the ſame which the Chaldaan nameth Kardu, to which Mountain the Frier Annius (citing this place out of Joſephus) makes him find another adjoyning, called Ocila, and to ſay that the Ark (of which Moſes the Law-giver of the Hebrews wrote) did firſt take ground on this Ocila. But I do not find any ſuch Mountain in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Joſephus. Strabo remembreth a Promontory in Arabia Fœlix, of that name, and Pliny finds a Mart-Town ſo called in the ſame, which Ptolomy calls Ocilis, Pinetus Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damaſcenus, or rather of Annius, ſeemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian Mountains. Beroſus calleth thoſe Mountains of Armenia Cordiai, and Curtius Cordei: Ptolomy Gordai and Gordiei: of which the Country next adjoyning is by this Nicolaus Damaſcenus called Ninyada, perhaps (as Becanus conjectures) for Myliada or rather Minni: which word is uſed for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia ſeems to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we ſhould ſay Minni of Syria; for that Armenia alſo was a part of Syria, Pliny witneſſeth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about theſe Mountains, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The Mountains are ſeated a part from all other to the North of that Ledge of Mountains called Taurus, or Niphates in the Plains of Armenia the great, near the Lake Thoſpitis: whence the River of Tigris floweth in 75 Degrees of Longitude, and 41 and 42 Degrees of Latitude. One of the Mountains Gordiei (that which ſurmounteth the reſt) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian ſignifieth a place of deſcent: but this out of Joſephus; which name (ſaith Junius) was of the event, becauſe of Noah's coming down with his Children. But this alſo I take to be a ſuppoſed event; ſeeing any Hill, from whence on every ſide we muſt deſcend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place in Joſephus Λέβυες (Kubaris.) That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, becauſe Joſeph. l. 1. c. 4. ſays, the place is called Ἀναβατήριον (as it were the deſcent or coming down) and Epiphan. l. 1. cont. Hæreſ. calls it Λόραι: which word in the Armenian and Ægyptian Tongue ſignifieth deſcent, of Lubar, which is to deſcend; whence alſo Lubra is a Synagogue, becauſe it was commonly built on ſome high place: whereof alſo the Latin Delubrum may ſeem to be derived; and Act. 6.9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Ægyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra Tenu. Yet this Opinion hath been embraced from Age to Age: receiving a habit of ſtrength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwiſe rightly be given, eſpecially to that Mountain, by reaſon that the paſſage was more fair, up and down unto it, than to any of the reſt adjoyning.

The first Argument against the common Opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so near a place as Armenia.

BUT there are many Arguments to perswade me, that the Ark of Noah did not rest it self in any part of Armenia, and that the Mountain Ararat was not Baris, not any one of the Gordiaan Mountains.

Beros. l. 1. For first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. Year, or in the Year 131. after the Flood, when Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Cush, and Chaldæa. If then the Ark had first found Land in Armenia, it is very unprobable, that the Children of Noah which came into that Valley could have spent so many Years in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was only interjacent, which might by easie Journeys have been past over in 10. days; and to hasten and help which Passage the Navigable River of Tygris offered it self, which is every where transpassable by Boats of great burden: so as where the Desart on the one side resisted their Expedition, the River on the contrary side served to advance it; the River rising out of the same Ledge of Mountains, or at the Foot of them, where the Ark of Noah was first supposed to settle it self; Then, if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surprise of a second Flood (according to the Opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it soundeth ill to the Ear of Reason, that they would have spent many Years in that low and overflown Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Rivers which imbroider or compass it: for the Effects witnessed their Affections, and the Works, which they undertook, their Unbelief; being no sooner arrived in Shinaar, but they began to provide themselves of a Defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared Inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdom, the first known City of the World founded after the Flood, about 131. Years, or (as others suppose) ten Years later: though (for my self) I rather think, that they undertook that Work in two respects, first, to make themselves famous, To get us a Name (saith the Text:) Gen. 10. 10. Secondly, thereby to usurp Dominion over the rest. Beros. l. 1.

†. IV.

The second Argument, That the Eastern People were most ancient in Populosity, and in all Humane Glory.

FOR a second Argument: The Civility, Magnificence and multitude of People (wherein the East parts of the World first abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noah's taking Land there. And that this is true, the use of Printing and Artillery (among many other things which the East had) may easily perswade us, that those Sun-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certainty of this Report, that the East Indians (time out of mind) have had Guns and Ordnance of Battery, confirmed by the Portugals and others, makes us now to understand, That the place of Philostratus in vita Apollonii Tianæi, l. 2. c. 14. is no Fable, though expresst in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wise Men which dwell between Hyphasis and Ganges, use not themselves to go forth into Battail: that they but drive away their Enemies with Thunder and Lightning sent from Jupiter. By which means there it is said, That Semiramis Egyptius and Barbius, joyning their Forces were defeated there; and that the Eagle there chast away his golden Shield. For the Invention of Letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because he brought them first into Greece: of which the People (then rude and savage) had reason to give him the Honour, from whom they received the Benefit. But it is true, that Letters are no less ancient than Seth or Henoch were; for they are said to have written on Pillars of Stone (as before remembred) long before the Flood. But from the Eastern World it was that John Cathenberg a German, brought the Device of Printing; by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the Practice thereof to Rome: and after that, Nicolaus Gerson a Frenchman bettered both the Letters and Invention. And notwithstanding that this Mystery was then supposed to be but newly born, the Chinaes had Letters long before either the Ægyptians or Phœnicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greeks had neither any civil Knowledge, or any Letters among them.

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witnessed, who about an hundred Years since discovered those Kingdoms, and do now enjoy their rich Trades therein: for the Chinaes account all other Nations but Salvages in respect of themselves.

And to add strength to this Argument, the Conquest and Story of Alex. Macedon may justly be called to witness, who found more Cities and Sumptuosity in that little Kingdom of Porus, which lay side by side to the East India, than in all his other Travels and Undertakings. For in Alexander's time Learning and Greatness had not travelled so far to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Country, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his Eye, and the Fame of the East pierced his Ears. And if we look as far as the Sun-rising, and hear Paulus Venetus what he reporteth of the uttermost Angle and Island thereof, we shall find that those Nations have sent out, and not received, lent Knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more civil, the farther West the more salvage. And of the Isle of Japan (now Zipinguri) Venetus maketh this Report: Incolæ religioni, literis, & sapientiæ sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius orationc, quam (more nostro) sacris in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant. The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to Religion, Letters, and Philosophy, and most diligent searchers out of Truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than Prayer, which they use in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The Antiquity, Magnificence, Civility, Riches, sumptuous Buildings, and Policy in Government, is reported to be such by those who have been employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceed (in those formerly named, and divers other particulars) all other Kingdoms of the World.

†. V.

The third Argument, From the wonderful Resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.

BUT for a third Argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the Invasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and advised Reader: who may consider in what Age she lived, and how ſoon after the Worlds new birth ſhe gathered her Army (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctefias reporteth) of more than three Millions to invade India, to which he adjoineth alſo 500000. Horſe, and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we believe but a third part, it ſhall ſuffice to prove that India was the firſt planted and peopled Country after the Flood. Now as touching the time wherein ſhe lived: All Hiſtorians conſent, that ſhe was the Wife of Ninus; and the moſt approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Son of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Son of Cuſh, Cuſh of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at ſuch time as Nimrod came into Shinaar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the City and Tower of Babel may appear; and being then ſo multiplied and increaſed, the two Deſcents caſt between Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time thoſe multitudes, whereof her Army was compoſed. Let us then ſee with whom ſhe encountred in that War with this her powerful Army: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equalling her own, conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whoſe multitudes this is the Witneſs of Diodor. Siculus. Staurobates, avitis majoribus quàm quæ erant Semiramidis copiis. Staurobates gathering together greater Troops than thoſe of Semiramis. If then theſe numbers of Indians had been encreaſed but by a Colony ſent out from Shinaar, (and that alſo after Babel was built, which no doubt took ſome time in the performance) this Increaſe in the Eaſt, and this Army of Staurobates muſt have been made of Stone, or ſomewhat elſe by Miracle. For as the Numbers which Semiramis gathered might eaſily grow up in that time, from ſo great a Troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as ſhall be demonſtrated hereafter in the Story of Iſrael) ſo could not any ſuch time, by any multiplication natural, produce ſo many Bodies of Men, as were in the Indian Army victorious over Semiramis, if the Colonies ſent thither had been ſo late as Babel overturned, and the confuſion of Languages. For if we allow 65. Years time after the Flood, before Nimrod was born: of which 30. Years to Cuſh ere he begat Seba, after whom

Gen. 10. 7. he had Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then 30. Years to Raamah, ere he begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were born before Nimrod: and five Years to his five elder Brothers, which make 65. and then twice 30. Years for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their Sons, and that a third Generation might grow up, which makes in all 125. Years, there will then remain ſix Years to have been ſpent in travelling from the Eaſt, ere they arrived in Shinaar in the Year after the Flood 131. And ſo the followers of Nimrod might be of ſufficient multitude. But as for thoſe which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the Year 101: and the Confuſion to have been at Peleg's Birth, theſe Men do all by Miracle: they beget whole Nations without the help of Time, and build Nimrod's Tower in the Air; and not on thoſe low and mariſh Grounds (which require ſound Foundations) in the Plains of Shinaar. For except that huge Tower were built in a Day, there could be no confuſion in that Year 101. or at Peleg's Birth. And therefore it is far more probable, that Nimrod uſurped Regal Authority in the 131. Year after the Flood, (according to Beroſus) and that the Work of Babel laſted forty Years (according to Glycas) hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incaſſum laboramibus: Men labouring in vain 40. Years to finiſh it. By which Account it falls out, that it was 170. Years after the Flood, ere a Colony were ſent into Eaſt India; which granted (the one being the main Body, and the other but a Troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed, that Staurobates could have exceeded Semiramis in Numbers: who being then Empreſs of all that part of the World, gathered the moſt of Nations into one Body.

†. VI.

The fourth Arguments from divers Conſiderations in the Perſon of Noah.

FOurthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the World before the Flood; and had lived therein the long time of 600. Years; was all that ſpace 130. Years after the Flood without any certain Habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with Reaſon, that Nimrod was but the Conductor of thoſe People, by Noah deſtinied and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the Earth and the Weſtern World; (which Travels Noah put over to young and able Bodies) and that Noah himſelf then covered with many Years planted himſelf in the ſame place which God had aſſigned him: which was where he firſt came down out of the Ark from the Waters: For it is written, that after Noah came down out of the Ark he planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whoſe Buſineſs was to dreſs and manure the Earth, and not to range over ſo many parts of the World, as from Armenia into Arabia Felix, where he ſhould (if the Tradition be ſound) have left certain Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spain, where they ſay he ſetled other Companies; and built Cities after the Names of Noela and Noegla his Sons Wives: from thence into Italy, where they ſay he found his Son Cham the Saturn of Egypt, who had corrupted the People and Subjects of Gomer in his abſence: with whom Noah (as they make the Story) had patience for three Years; but then finding no amendment, they ſay, he baniſh'd him out of Italy. Theſe be but the Fancies of Beroſus Annianus, a plain imitation of the Grecian Fables. For let every reaſonable Man conceive, what it was to travel far in ſuch a Foreſt as the World was, when after ſo great a rotting of the Earth by the Flood the ſame lay waſte and over-grown for 130. or 140. Years, and wherein there could hardly be found either Path or Paſſage through which Men were able to creep, for Woods, Buſhes and Briars that in thoſe Years were grown up.

And there are ſo many Reaſons, proving that Noah never came into the Valley of Shinaar, as we need not ſuſpect his Paſſage into Italy or Spain: For Noah, who was Father of all thoſe Nations, a Man reverenced both for his Authority, Knowledge, Experience and Piety, would never have permitted his Children and Iſſues to have undertaken that unbelieving preſumptuous Work of Babel. Rather by his Preſence and prevalent Perſwaſions he would have bound their hands from ſo vain Labours, and by the Authority which he received even from God himſelf, he would have held them in that awful ſubjection, as whatſoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durſt not have diſobeyed the perſonal Commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kind of Regal Authority over his Children and People. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former deſtruction of Mankind was by themſelves purchaſed through Cruelty and Diſobedience; and that to diſtruſt God, and to raiſe up Building againſt his Almighty Power, was as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay on them the ſame, if not a more ſharp affliction.

affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came so far West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greatest Troop, because they had the greatest Part of the World to plant) under Nimrod, or those upon whom he usurped. Nauclerus and Cœlestinus take the Testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the People after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Joctan; of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Joctan of Sem, and Suphene of Japhet. This Opinion I cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a Work as the Worlds Plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the Sons of Sem: Joctan, Havilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adjoyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sons of Joctan, or of all the rest a certain number (Cham and his issue only excepted) that Noah kept with himself, it cannot be known. Of which Plantation I shall speak at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moves me to believe, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinaar, is that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the story of the Hebrews; or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all Mankind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principal a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his Age and wearisome experience of the World) withdrawn himself, and rested apart with his best beloved, giving himself to the service and contemplation of God and Heavenly things, after he had directed his Children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warm and fertile soil, where he planted his Vineyard, and drest the Earth; after which, and his thanks-giving to God by sacrifice; he is not remembred in the Scriptures, because he was so far away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their Enemies and Borderers.

†. VII.

Of the senseless Opinion of Annius the Commentor upon Berosus: that the Ark rested upon Montes Caspii in Armenia, and yet upon Gordiæi, which are three hundred Miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

IT remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries upon Berosus and others, labour-eth marvelously to prove, that the Ark of Noah rested upon the Armenian Mountains called Caspii; which Mountains separate Armenia from the upper Media, and do equally belong to both. And because all his Authors speak of the Mountains Gordiæi, he hath no other shift to unite these Opinions, but by uniting those far distant Mountains together. To effect which he hath found no other invention, than to charge those Men with error which have carefully overseen, printed, and published Ptolomy's Geography, in which they are altogether dissevered: for that last edition of Mercator's, sets these Hills five Degrees (which makes three hundred English Miles) asunder. And certainly, if we look into those more ancient Copies of Villanovanus and others, we shall find nothing in them to help Annius withall: for in those the Mountains Caspii stand seven Degrees to the East of the Gordiæi, which make 420. Miles. And for those Authors by whose Authority Annius strengthneth himself, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giveth this judgement upon them in the like dispute. Aberrarunt vero omnes, non negligentia, sed regnorum suus ignorantia. They have all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdoms. But for an induction, to prove that the Ark of Noah stood on the Mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to prove the same he citeth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250. years before Ninus, the Earth was overflown with Waters, & in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, and that in Scythia Saga the stock of mortal Men was renewed. The same Author also teacheth that the Umbri before remembred (who were so called, because saved from Deucalion's flood) were the Sons of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse Janum cum Dyrim & Gallis Progenitoribus Umbrorum: From these Scythians, he saith, that Janus came with Dyrim and with the Galli the Progenitors of the Umbri; And again, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythis tribuitur, Certainly, the prime antiquity of off-spring is always given to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia under tribute till Ninus time. Also Pliny calleth the Umbri which long since inhabited Italy, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to prove that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephews of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the Mountains, on which the Ark rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he feigneth a Nation of Scythians called Araxea, taking Name of the Mountain Ararat, near the River of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia Mankind was restored after the great Flood, 250 Years before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, in Scythia Saga Mankind was restored; he therefore in the Proem of his Commentary upon Berosus, leaveth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia salvatos. For Scythia Saga or Saca is undoubtedly under the Mountains of Paropanisus, on which, or near which it is most probable that the Ark first took ground; and from those East parts (according to Moses) came all those Companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the best Authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name a Scytha Rege eorum, from Scytha their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanity, or rather (indeed) his falsehood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Author, beginneth in that place with these words. Fabulantur Scythæ, The Scythians fable: and his Interpreter in the Table of that Work giveth this Title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula; The original and success of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeed) there needs no great disproof hereof, since Ptolomy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga, or Saca, and sets them in 130 Degrees of Longitude: and the Persians, (saith Herodotus) dotus) call all the Scythians Saca, which Pliny confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (saith Pliny) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they give all the rest that Name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no Man believeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78 Degrees of Longitude (that is) 42 Degrees distant from the Saca; and the Country about Araxes Ptolomy calleth Colthene and Sodicene and Sacapene, without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians, either within Imaus or without, to the number of 100 several Nations are by Ptolomy precisely set down.

L. 6. c. 17.

Tab. Asiæ, 7. & 8.

But to come to those later Authors, whereof some have written, others have seen a great Part of those North-East Regions, and searched their Antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountains is also beyond our Purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem ea est, quæ proprio vocabulo Gallaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, usque ostia Oxi amnis in Hyrcanum mare exeuntis; & parte ipsius maris hinc usque ad Rha fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountain Imaus is that part of the World which in their own Speech is at this time called Gallaria; and the same is bounded on the West-side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaan Mountains: on the North by unknown Lands: on the South by the Saccæ (which are the Sacæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the Mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as far as the Mouth of Rha.

Rha now Wolga. Com. 2. Asiæ, fol. 472.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (qua magna sanè regio est, & qua innumeras Nationes complectitur, Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations, (saith Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant us, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plain, he dissevereth Sarmatia it self from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albanea, which he leaveth on the right Hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

Ad meridiem flexo Bosphoro pars septentrionalis ponte Euxini usque in ostium Coracis fluvii: unde relictis à parte dextra Colchis, Iberis, Albaniisque in Littus Hyrcani maris provenit. Spec. hist. l. 30.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian, or Scythian Nations; neither doth his Fellow Frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus an Armenian born, of the blood of those Kings, (though afterward a Monk) ever acknowledge himself for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian races descended: though he write that story at large, gathered by Nicolaus Salcuni, and (by the commandment of Pope Clement the Fifth) in the Year 1307 published.

Neither doth Matthias à Michon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian born, and that travailed a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, find Armenia any way within the compass of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no Man (whose travails are extant) hath observed so much of those Regions as he hath done: proving and disproving many things, heretofore subject to dispute. And among others he burieth that ancient and received opinion, That out of the Mountains Riphæi, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; proving by unanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountains in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountains of those famous Rivers, are now by the Trade of Muscovia known to every Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, woody, and marish Grounds. The River of Tanais or Don, ariseth to the South of the City Tulla, some twenty English Miles, out of a Lake called Iwanowesero in the great Wood Okenitzkilies or Jepiphanolies. Volga, which Ptolomy calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fronow, in the great Wood Vodkonzki: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Borysthenes (now Nyeper) and Dsuina or Dividna. And this learned Polonian doth in this sort bound the Europæan Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscovians, and those adjoyning, bounded on the West by the River of Vissa, the name perchance misprinted Vissa for Vistula, a River which parts Germany and Sarmatia: and for the East Border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same River of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to withhold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomy calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem, Scythia within the Mountain Imaus. And the same Matthias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it self above three hundred and a few odd Years before his own time: these be his words. Constat eam esse gentem novam, & adventitiam à partibus Orientis, (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asiæ Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the Coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, and got new seats a little more than three hundred Years since: for (indeed) before that time the Goths or Pouloci inhabited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Matthias lived in the Year 1511. and this his discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the Year 1506 as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Ark of Noah rested; and the Scythæ Sacæ were those People which lived at the North Foot of those Mountains of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mix themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony than the general description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolomy, it is plain, that between all parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariacæ) between Jaxartus and Jactus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariacæ, or Scythia Araxea which Annius placeth in Armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe?

The fifth Argument, The Vine must grow naturally near the place where the Ark rested.

TO this if we add the consideration of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a Vineyard, we shall find that the Fruit of the Vine or Raisin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Ark was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italy and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a far colder Country. For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at

Gen. 9. 20.

Servius Æneid. Europæ ac

at such time as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italy there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gauls remained between the Pyrenæs and the Alps, near unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, until they drunk Wine, which was first brought them out of Italy; and after they tasted thereof they hasted to inhabit that Country, which brought forth such pleasant Fruit: so as it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not natural in France, but from Italy brought thither; as by Saturn from elsewhere into Italy.

Now it is manifest that Noah travailed not far to seek out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembred, before there was any counsel how to dispose of the World among his Children: and the first thing he did was to till the Ground, and to plant a Vineyard, after his Sacrifice and thanks-giving to God; and whersoever the Ark rested, there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appear that he travailed far: for the Scriptures teach us, that he was a Husband-man, and not a Wanderer.

Answer to an Objection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole Earth.

AND that all the Children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appear, saving that it may be inferred out of these words [from thence] because it is written: So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sibylla (as they are converted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar, for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem ædificarunt altissmam, quasi per eam cœlum essent ascensuri; Certain of them built a most high Tower, as if they meant thereby to have scaled the Heavens.

†. X.

An answer to the Objection from the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the heighth of the Hills there.

BUt before I conclude this part, it is necessary to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what Reason may be found out to make it true or probable, that the Ark of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountains of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Ark rested on (or upon) the Mountains of Ararat or Armenia, saith the marginal note of the Geneva, the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardu; of which the highest hath the Name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint do not convert at all, but keep the same word) is taken to be a Mountain of Armenia, because Armenia it self had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the heighth (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Ark first sate thereon.

Gen. 8. 14.

But these Suppositions have no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountains of equal stature to many other Mountains of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Ark found the highest Mountain of all other to rest on: for the Plains were also uncovered, before Noah came out of the Ark. Now if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the books of the Sibylls it is written, that the Mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was supposed that the Ark stayed after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and seat of these Mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the City of Cœlenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description she maketh mention of Marsyas, a River which runneth through Part of Phrygia, and afterward joyneth it self with the River Maander: which is far from the Gordiæan Mountains in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Josephus, (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Josephus sets Ararat between Armenia and Parthia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withal, that in the Province of Cæron by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the Waters have from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunt that they had in those days reserved some pieces of Noah's Ark. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Province of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is between Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountains Cordiæi was first borrowed out of Berosus by Josephus; yet the Text which Josephus citeth out of Berosus, differs far from the words of that Berosus, which wandereth up and down in these days, set out by Annius. For Berosus cited by Josephus hath these words: Fertur & navigii hujus pars in Armenia, apud montem Cordiæorum superesse, & quosdam Bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice Amuleti loci hujus homines uti solent, (which is) It is reported also that a part of this Ship is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Cordiæan Mountains; and that divers do scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it instead of an Amulet. But Annius his Edition of the fragment of Berosus useth these words. Nam elevata ab aquis in Gordiæi Montis vertice quievit, cujus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa bitumen tollere quo maxime utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Ark being lifted up by the Waters, rested on the top of the Gordiæan Mountains, of which it is reported that some parts remain, and that men do carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith. So as in these two Texts (besides the difference of words) the name is diversly written: The ancient Berosus writes Cordiæi with a [C] and the Fragment Gordiæi with a [G:] the one that the Bitumen is used for a Preservative against Poyson or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice; And if it be said that they agree in the general, yet it is reported by neither from any certain knowledge, nor from any approved Author: for one of them useth the word [fertur] the other [dicitur] the one, that so it is reported: the other, that so it is said; and both but by Hearsay, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, these Mountains which Ptolomy calls Gordiæi, are not those Mountains which himself giveth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountains of Armenia Moschici. These be his own words: Montes Armeniæ nominantur ii, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protenduntur usq ad superjacentem partem Ponti Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountains of Armenia are they which are called Moſchici, which ſtretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: alſo the hill which is called Paryardes; which Mountains Pliny calleth Pariedri, and both which lye to the North of Gordiæi or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a half; and the Gordiæan Mountains in 39. and a half: from the Northermoſt of which did the Georgians take their names, who were firſt Gordians and then Georgians, who amidſt all the ſtrength of the greateſt infidels of Perſia and Turkey, do ſtill remain Chriſtians. Concerning the other ſuppoſitions, that the Mountains of Gordiei, otherwiſe Baris Kardu or Lubar, (which Ptolomy calleth Togordiaion) are the higheſt of the World, the ſame is abſolutely falſe.

Of Caucaſus, and divers far higher hills than the Armenian.

FOr the beſt Coſmographers with others, that have ſeen the Mountains of Armenia, find them far inferiour, and under-ſet to divers other Mountains even in that part of the World, and elſewhere: as the Mountain Athos between Macedon and Thrace, which Ptolomy calls Olympus, now called Lacas, (ſaith Caſtaldus) is far ſurmounting any Mountain that ever hath been ſeen in Armenia: for it caſteth ſhade three hundred Furlongs, which is ſeven and thirty Miles and upwards: of which Plutarch. Athos adumbrat latera Lemniæ bovis, Athos ſhadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Alſo the Mount of Olympus in Theſſalie, is ſaid to be of that heighth, as neither the Winds, Clouds, or rain overtop it. Again, the Mountain of Antandrus in Myſia, not far from Ida, whence the River Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is alſo of a far more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be ſeen from Conſtantinople. There are alſo in Mauritania near the Sea, the famous Mountains of Atlas, of which Herodotus. Extat in hoc maris Mons, cui nomen Atlas, ita ſublimis eſſe dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non poſſint; Upon this Coaſt there is a Mountain called Atlas, whoſe heighth is ſaid to be ſuch as the eye of no mortal man can diſcern the top thereof. And if we may believe Ariſtotle, then are all theſe inferiour to Caucaſus, which he maketh the moſt notorious both for breadth and heighth. Caucaſus Mons omnium maximus, qui æſtivum ad ortum ſunt, acumine atque latitudine, cujus juga à Sole radiantur uſque ad conticinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occaſu. Caucaſus (ſaith Ariſtotle) is the greateſt Mountain both for breadth and heighth of all thoſe in the North-eaſt, whoſe tops are lightned by the Sun-beams, uſque ad conticinium (which is, ſaith Macrobius) between the firſt crowing after Midnight and the break of Day: Others affirm that the top of this Mountain holds the Sun-beams when it is dark in the Valley; but I cannot believe either: for the higheſt Mountain of the World known, is that of Tenerif in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Weſtward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not injoy the Suns company at any ſuch late hours. Beſides, theſe Mountains which Ariſtotle calleth Caucaſi, are thoſe which ſeparate Colchis from Iberia; though (indeed) Caucaſus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phaſis riſeth in the ſame Mountain, which himſelf calleth Caucaſus, and that Phaſis ſpringeth from thoſe hills which ſunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifeſt) yieldeth it ſelf to the Sea two Degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabeſunda) howſoever Mercator bring it from Paryardes.

†. XII.

Of divers incongruities, if in this Story we ſhould take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth firſt appear, that there is no certainty what Mountain Ararat was: for the books of the Sibyls ſet it in Phrygia: and Beroſus in Armenia: and as for Beroſus's authority, thoſe men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the higheſt hill, and therefore moſt likely that the Ark grounded thereon, the aſſertion and ſuppoſition have equal credit: for there are many hills which exceed all thoſe of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Ark ſhould ſit on the higheſt.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any ſuch Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (ſaith Hierome) ſignifieth high Towers: and ſo may all high hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the hills of Caucaſus (out of which Indus riſeth) than to any hills of Armenia. For thoſe of Caucaſus in the Eaſt, are undoubtedly the higheſt of Aſia.

Fourthly, the Authors themſelves do not agree in what Region the Mountains Gordiæi ſtand: for Ptolomy diſtinguiſheth the Mountains of Armenia from the Gordiæan, and calleth thoſe of Armenia Moſchici and Paryardes, as aforeſaid. Now Paryardes is ſeated near the middle of Armenia, out of which on the Weſt-ſide riſeth Euphrates, and out of the Eaſt-ſide Araxis: and the Mountains Moſchici are thoſe hills which disjoyn Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary ſituation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvail that the ſame ledge of hills running from Armenia to India, ſhould keep the ſame name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

LAſtly, we muſt blow up this Mountain Ararat it ſelf, or elſe we muſt dig it down, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it elſewhere, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) ſet it Eaſt from Shinaar: or elſe we ſhall wound the truth it ſelf with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the miſtaking open to every eye, we muſt underſtand, that Ararat (named by Moſes) is not any one Hill, ſo called, no more than any one Hill among thoſe Mountains which divide Italy from France, is called the Alps: or any one among thoſe which part France from Spain is the Pyrenian; but as theſe being continuations of many Hills keep one name in divers Countries: ſo all that long ledge of Mountains, which Pliny calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomy both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, until they encounter and croſs the Mountains of the great Imaus, are of one general name, and are called the Moun-

Mountains of Ararat or Armenia, becauſe from thence or thereabout they ſeem to ariſe. So all theſe Mountains of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caſpii, Moſchici, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diverſly called by Pliny and others) Ptolomy calls by one name Caucaſus, lying between the Seas Caſpium and Euxinus: as all thoſe Mountains which cut aſunder America, even from the new Kingdom of Granado, to the Streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as theſe Mountains of Ararat run Eaſt and Weſt: ſo do thoſe marvellous Mountains of Imaus ſtretch themſelves North and South; and being of like extent, well near, are called by the name of Imaus, even as Pliny calleth theſe former Hills Taurus, and Moſes the Hills of Ararat. The reaſon of ſeveral names given by Ptolomy was thereby the better to diſtinguiſh the great Regions and Kingdoms, which theſe great Mountains bound and diſſever; as Armenia, Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, Media, Suſiana, Perſia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Baltria, Sogdiana, and Paroponiſus: having all theſe Kingdoms either on the North or South-ſide of them. For all the Mountains of Aſia (both the leſs and the greater) have three general names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucaſus: and they receive other Titles, as they ſever and divide particular Places and Regions. For theſe Mountains which ſunder Cilicia from the reſt of Aſia the leſs on the North-ſide, are called Taurus; and thoſe Mountains which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Amanus: the Mountains called Taurus running Eaſt and Weſt, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus the River of Euphrates forceth her paſſage, leaving the name of Amanus to the Mountains on her Weſt-bank; and on her Eaſt-ſide the Mountains are ſometimes known by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomy's three Tables of Aſia) and ſometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation ſo long as they bound Armenia from Meſopotamia: and after the River of Tygris cutteth them aſunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, until they ſeparate Aſſyria and Media; but then they call themſelves Coatras, though between the upper and nether Media, they do not appear, but altogether diſcontinue. For at Mazada in Media, they are not found, but run through the Eaſtern Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themſelves Orontes, and towards the Eaſt-part Coronus; out of the Southern-part whereof the River of Bagradus riſeth, which divideth the ancient Perſia from Caramania: and then continuing their courſe Eaſtward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themſelves into the Mountains of Sariphi, out of which riſeth the River Margus, afterward yielding her ſelf to Oxus: (now Abia) and drawing now near their ways end, they firſt make themſelves the South border of Baltria, and are then honoured with the Title of Paropaniſus; and laſtly of Caucaſi, even where the famous River of Indus with his principal Companions Hydaſpis and Zaradrus ſpring forth, and take beginning. And here do theſe Mountains build themſelves exceeding high, to equal the ſtrong Hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35,36, and 37 Degrees of Latitude, and in 140 of Longitude: of the which the Weſt-parts are now called Delanguer, and the reſt Nagracot; and theſe Mountains in this place only are properly called Caucaſi (ſaith Ptolomy) that is, between Paropaniſus and Imaus: and improperly, between the two Seas of Caſpium and Pontus.

Ptol. tab. Aſia.

†. XIV.

Of the beſt Vine naturally growing on the South-ſide of the Mountains Caucaſi, and toward the Eaſt Indies: and of other excellencies of the Soil.

NOW in this part of the World it is, where the Mountain and River Janus, and the Mountain Nyſeus (ſo called of Bacchus Niſeus or Noa) are found: and on theſe higheſt Mountains of that part of the World did Goropius Becanus conceive that the Ark of Noah grounded after the Flood: of all his conjectures the moſt probable, and by beſt reaſon approved. In his Indoſcythica he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantaſtical Opinions of this ſubject. And as the ſame Becanus alſo noteth; that as in this part of the World are found the beſt Vines: ſo it is as true, that in the ſame Line, and in 34, 35, and 36 Degrees of Septentrional Latitude are the moſt delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Judæa, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewiſe in this Region of Margiana, and under theſe Mountains, Strabo affirmeth that the moſt excellent Vines of the World are found; the cluſters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, becauſe this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Paleſtina, where the Searchers of the Land by Moſes direction found Bunches of equal bigneſs at Eſchol: Num. 13.24

The fruitfulneſs of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of theſe Hills, Curtius witneſſeth. For in Margiana, near the Mountain of Meros, did Alexander Feaſt himſelf and his Army ten days together, finding therein the moſt delicate Wine of all other.

†. XV.

The Concluſion, with a brief repeating of divers chief Points.

AND therefore to conclude this Opinion of Ararat, it is true, that thoſe Mountains do alſo traverſe Armenia: yea, and Armenia it ſelf ſometime is known by the name of Ararat. But L. 5. c. 27. as Pliny giveth to this Ledge of high Hills, even from Cilicia to Paropaniſus and Caucaſus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germany are called the Alps: and all between France and Spain the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000 Miles together, the Andes: ſo was Ararat the general name which Moſes gave them; the diverſity of Appellations no otherwiſe growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers Regions and divers Countries. For in the like caſe do we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it waſheth the Coaſts of Carthage, and over againſt it, it is called Tyrrhenum: between Italy and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo Adriaticum: between Athens and Aſia Ægeum: between Seſtus and Abydus Helleſpont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Boſphorus. And as in theſe, ſo is the Ocean to the North-eaſt part of Scotland called Deucaledonycum: and on this ſide, the Brittan Sea: to the Eaſt, the Germane and Baltick; and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this Queſtion we muſt appeal to that Judge which cannot err, even to the word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain ſenſe: ſeeing it can admit neither diſtinction, nor other conſtruction than the words bear literally, because they are used to the very same plain purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely where the sense is plain, (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be wary, how we fancy to our selves any new or strange exposition; and (withal) to resolve our selves, that every word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Book. And therefore we must respect and reverence the Testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as S. Augustine hath taught us touching the Gospel of Christ Jesus (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat, quod (narrantibus discipulis Christi) in Evangelio legerit, quàm si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexerit. That no Man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the Gospel, (the Disciples of Christ having written it) than if he had seen the very Hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own Body, setting it down.

Gen. c. 11. v. 2. The words then of Moses which end this dispute are these: And as they went from the East they found a plain in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode, which proveth without controversie, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Ark of Noah rested and took Land to the Eastward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places whersoever Moses maketh a difference of Countries, he always precisely nameth toward what Quarters of the World the same were seated: as where he teacheth the Plantation of Joctan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cain's departure from the presence of God, he addeth: And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after he departed from Sechem, he used these words: Afterwards removing thence unto a mountain East-ward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: having Bethel on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written: And Abraham went forth journying towards the South: also when Ezekiel propheſied of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togorma were of the North Quarters: and of the Queen of Saba it is written, That she came from the South to visit Salomon: And the Magi (or wise men) came out of the East to offer presents unto Christ. And that all Regions, and these travels were precisely set down upon the points of the Compass and Quarters of the World, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Judea, Saba South from Jerusalem: the way from Bethel to Ægypt directly South; and the Cœlesyrians, the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palastina: and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Valley of Babylonia, is not a journying from the East, nor so near unto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it self; and we must not say of Moses (whose Hands the Holy Ghost directed) that he erred toto cœlo, and that he knew not East from West. For the Body of Armenia standeth in forty three Degrees Septentrional, and the North-part thereof in forty five; and those Gordiaan Mountains, whereon it was supposed that the Ark rested, stand in forty one. But Babylonia, and the Valley of Shinaar are situated in thirty five, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference between East and West) the Gordiaan Mountains stand in 75 Degrees, and the Valley of Shinaar in 79 and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinaar North-west, ninety five Degrees from the East; and if Armenia had been but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compass. But Gregory and Hierome warn us, In Scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllaba, apices & puncta in divina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus. In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every Speech, Syllable, Note, or Accent, and Point in Divine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth us that the Children of Noah came from the East, we may not believe Writers (of little Authority) who also speak by hearsay and by report, Ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lieth West from the place where the Ark of Noah rested after the Flood; and therefore it first found Ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first Civil, which had Noah himself for an Instructer: and directly East from Shinaar in the same Degree of 35 are the greatest Grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also, which overtopped in number those Millions of Semiramis, prove that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other Opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my self, I build on his words who in plain terms hath told us, that the Sons of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Ark rest on those Eastern Mountains, called by one general name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountains of Ararat, and not on those Mountains of the North-west, as Berosus first feigned, whom most part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentiful warm East where Noah rested, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the Ground, and lived thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agriculturæ studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamque rem suâ ipsius linguâ Ish-Adamath (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur celebratusque est. The study of Husbandry pleased Noah (saith the excellent learned Man Arias Montanus) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that Noah excelled all Men: and therefore was he called in his own Language a Man exercised in the Earth. Which also sheweth that he was no wanderer: and that he troubled not himself with the contentions, beginning again in the World, and among Men, but staied in his destinied places, and in that part of the World, where he was first delivered out of the Prison of the Ark, whereinto God had committed him to preserve him and Mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first Planting of Nations after the Flood; and of the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

Whether Shem and Ham were elder than Japhet.

August. de civit. Dei, l. 16. c. 3.

OF these Sons of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a Question made. S. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the youngest: and herein the Opinions of Writers are divers. But this we find every where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in Years, but in Vertue, as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the Controversie: The Latin Translation, and so the Geneva, hath converted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these words: Unto Shem also the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and elder Brother of Japhet, were children born. But Junius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same words in this manner: To Shem also the Father of all the Sons of Heber, and Brother of Japhet, the eldest Son were children born: So the transposition of the word [elder] made this difference. For if the word [elder] had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japhet, as it is by these Translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods Blessings are not tied to first and last in Blood, but to the eldest in Piety, yet the Arguments are stronger for Japhet than for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any Man of Judgment should make valuation of conjectural Arguments, for Mens Opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundreth Year of his Life, begat the first of his three Sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and in the six hundreth Year (to wit) the hundreth Year following, came the general Flood; two Years after which Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the Year 602. of Noah's Life, and in the Year of Shem's Life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100 Years old, two Years after the Flood: and Noah begat his first-born being 500 Years old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then been a hundred Years old at the Flood, and in the six hundreth Year of Noah's Life, and not two Years after. Which seeing the Scripture before remembred hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him (to wit) Ham; of necessity the first place doth belong to Japhet. This younger son so converted by the vulgar and Geneva, Junius turns it Filius minimus, his youngest Son; but S. Chrysostom takes it otherwise, and finds Cham to be the middle or second Brother, and Japhet the youngest Son of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father, (whose nakedness he derided) was disinherited, and lost the preheminency of his Birth, as Esau and Reuben did. Pererius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but avoweth withal, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative Degree. It is true that Shem himself was always named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet: in the second Verse Moses leaveth to begin with the Issue by Shem, and reciteth the Children of Japhet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his Election and Benediction, and for this weighty respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, David, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar, Pagninus, and the Geneva, who agree in this Conversion, Shem frater Japhet major; or with the Septuagint, Junius, and Tremelius, Shem fratri Japhet majoris; or with Pererius, Shem frater Japhet ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous Brother of Japhet, let the Reader judge. But for ought that I have seen to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shem's age at the time of the Flood did not agree with his eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures took no account of smaller numbers) I do not find in the Sciptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the flood; and again in the 12th. Verse, So Shela lived after he begat Ebar, four hundred and three years, &c. So as the number of two Years, of three Years, of five Years, and afterward of two Years were always precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of divers things that in all Reason are to be presumed, touching the first Planting of the World, as that all Histories must yield to Moses: that the World was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that the known great Lords of the first Ages were of the Issue of Ham.

BUT let us go unto the Worlds Plantation after the Flood, which being rightly understood, we shall find that many Nations have supposed or feigned themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which never saw or approached the Bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the Scriptures how the Sons and Issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the World was also peopled. And if any Prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so far as the Story of Nations is therein handled, we must know that both the Truth and Antiquity of the Books of God find no Companions equal, either in Age or Authority. All Record, Memory, and Testimony of Antiquity whatsoever, which hath come to the know-knowledge of Men, the ſame hath been borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all careful obſervers of time have noted: among which thus writeth Euſebius in the Proœme of his Chronology. †Moſes is found more ancient than all thoſe whom the Græcians make moſt ancient, as Homer, Heſiod, and the Trojan War; and far before Hercules, Muſæus, Linus, Chiron, Orpheus, Caſtor, Pollux, Æſculapius, Bacchus, Mercurius, and Apollo, and the reſt of the Gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or Holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of Jupiter, whom the Greeks have ſeated in the top and higheſt Turret of their Divinity.

Cicero de nat. Deorum, l. 3.

For of the three Jupiters remembred by Cicero, the ancienteſt was the Son of Æther, whoſe three Sons begotten on Proſerpina, were born at Athens, of which Cecrops was the firſt King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moſes bring the Children of Iſrael out of Ægypt. Eduxit Moſes populum Dei ex Ægypto noviſſimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſis Regis; Moſes brought the Children of Iſrael out of Ægypt, in the laſt days of Cecrops King of the Athenians, ſaith St. Auguſtine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the City it ſelf, but Theſeus long after him. But becauſe the truth hereof is diverſly proved, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut aſunder the purpoſe in hand by alledging many Authorities, in a needleſs queſtion, but leave it to the proper place.

Dt. Civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 11.

The Sons of Japhet were:
- Gomer.
  - The Sons of Gomer were: Aſkenaz., Riphath., Togorma.
- Magog.
- Madai.
- Javan.
  - The Sons of Javan were: Eliſha., Tarſhis., Kittim, and Dodanim.
- Tubal.
- Meſhach and Tiras.

Firſt, we are to conſider that the World after the Flood was not planted by Imagination, neither had the Children of Noah Wings, to fly from Shinaar to the uttermoſt border of Europe, Africa, and Aſia in haſte, but that theſe Children were directed by a wiſe Father, who knew thoſe parts of the World before the Flood, to which he diſpoſed his Children after it, and ſent them not as Diſcoverers, or at all adventure, but aſſigned and allotted to every Son and their Iſſues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authors, who have no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Auguſtus in the fiction of Æneas) or elſe to glorify their own Nations; Let us build herein upon the Scriptures themſelves, and after them upon Reaſon and Nature. Firſt, therefore we muſt call to mind and conſider, what manner of Face the Earth every where had in the 130. Year after the great Inundation, and by comparing thoſe fruitfuleſt Valleys with our own barren and cold ground, inform our ſelves thereby, what wonderful Deſarts, what impaſſable faſtneſs of Woods, Reeds, Bryars and rotten Graſs, what Lakes, and ſtanding Pools, and what Mariſhes, Fens, and Bogs, all the Face of the Earth (excepting the Mountains) was peſtered withal. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and deſtroying Winter depreſſeth all vegetative and growing Nature, for one half of the Year in effect) yet in twenty or thirty Years theſe our Grounds would all overgrow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with Woods or with other offenſive Thickets and Buſhments: much more did all ſorts of Plants, Reeds, and Trees, proſper in the moſt fruitful Vallies, and in the Climate of a long and warm Summer, and having withal the ſtart of 130. Years, to raiſe themſelves without controllment.

This being conſidered, it will appear, that all theſe People which came into Shinaar, and over whom Nimrod either by order or ſtrength took the Dominion, did after the confuſion of languages, and at ſuch time as they grew to be a mighty People diſperſe themſelves into the Regions adjoyning to the ſaid Valley of Shinaar, which contained the beſt part of Meſopotamia, Babylonia and Chaldæa, and from the Borders thereof in time they were propagated: ſome of them towards the South, others towards the Weſt and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both Eaſt and Weſt from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Paleſtina, which the Canaanites firſt poſſeſt; yet could he not enjoy the Lot of his inheritance on the ſuddain, but by time and Degrees. For we find, that Abraham the true ſucceſſor of Shem dwelt in Chaldæa at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he reſted at Charran in Meſopotamia: from whence after the Death of Thare he travailed to Sichem in Paleſtina: and yet there had paſſed between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themſelves) ſeven deſcents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldæa: where, and in Babylonia, all thoſe People by Nimrod commanded inhabited for many Years, and whence Nimrod went out into Aſſyria, and founded Nineveh. Indeed the great Maſters of Nations, (as far as we can know) were, in that Age of the Iſſues of Ham; the bleſſing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japhet taking leſs effect, until divers Years were conſumed; and until the time arrived, which by the wiſdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan came the People, and Princes, which held the great Kingdoms of Babylonia, Syria, and Ægypt for many deſcents together.

§. III.

Of the Iſles of the Gentiles in Japhet's portion: of Beroſus his too ſpeedy ſeating Gomer the Son of Japhet in Italy; and another of Japhet's Sons Tubal in Spain: and of the Antiquity of longinque Navigation.

TO begin therefore (where Moſes beginneth) with the Sons of Japheth, among whom the Iſles of the Gentiles were divided: which diviſion, as well to Japhet's Sons as to the reſt which came into Shinaar was (if the diviſion were made at Phaleg's birth) in the Year of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the Year after the Flood one hundred and one, of which queſtion elſewhere.

The habitations proper to the Sons of Japhet were the Iſles of the Gentiles. which include all Europe with all the Iſlands adjoyning, and compaſſing it about: Europe being alſo taken for an Iſland, both in reſpect that the Sea Helleſpont and Ægeum, Boſphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Aſia, as alſo becauſe Europe it ſelf is (in effect) ſurrounded with Water, ſaving that it is faſtened to Aſia by the North; for it hath thoſe Seas before named to the Eaſt, the Mediterran to the South and South-Weſt, the Ocean to the Weſt, and Britiſh, Germane and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-Eaſt, and North-Weſt. Beſides, it hath about it all the Cycladæ or Iſles lying between Greece and the leſſer Aſia, and the Iſles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Creet or Candia, Sicilia, Corſica, Sardinia, Malta, the Iſles of Brittany and Zealand, with their young ones adjacent.

This

This partition and portion of Japhet, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah. Dilatet Deus Japheth, Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posterity of) Japheth, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Junius here useth the word [alliciat] and not dilatet: and the Geneva persuadeat; yet the Septuagint have dilatet or amplificet; and such was the blessing given to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his seed for ever. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a Blessing by God to the Posterity of Japheth: noting not only an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should be made participant of God's Church. But to come to Japhet's Sons, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may believe Berosus and Annius, whose Authority the greatest number of all our late Writers have followed) did in the tenth Year of Nimrod's Raign depart from Babylonia, and planted Italy: which also Functius confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo Nimrodi, &c. In the tenth Year of Nimrod's Raign, Gomerus Gallus planted a Colony in that Land afterward called Italy: and in the twelfth Year of the same Nimrod's raign Tubal seated himself in Asturia in Spain (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. Years after the Flood, according to Berosus. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues the Children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let us therefore consider with Reason, what time the building such a City and Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready means to perform such a work as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himself out of his Author Berosus witnesseth,) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium, to the heighth and magnitude of the Mountains. Sure that both this City and Tower were almost builded the Scriptures witness. But the Lord came down to see the City and Tower, which the Sons of Men builded. Let us then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Brick to such a work, of the greatest heighth (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that ever was. For where the universal Flood covered the highest Mountains fifteen Cubits; Let us build us a City and a Tower (saith Nimrod) whose top may reach unto the Heaven: meaning, that they would raise their work above fifteen Cubits higher than the highest Mountain, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the fear of a second Inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Work. They also began this building upon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the World: as by the great ruin which these waters forcibly overbearing and overflowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approved also by the Prophet Jeremy, speaking of Babylon in these Words: Thou that dwellest upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantial Foundation, for so high a raised Building on a marish Ground: and to which Glycas upon Genesis giveth forty Years. For it seemeth, that the Tower was near finished when God overthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth, and they left to build the City. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very near had performed the Work of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the City adjoyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted that till such time as this Confusion seized them (whereupon the Tower was thrown down) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them upon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now to think that this work in the newness of the World (wanting all Instruments and Materials) could be performed in ten Years; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same Year could creep through 3000. Miles of Desart, with Women, Children, and Cattle: let those light believers, that neither tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to Reason, approve it, for I do not. And if the Ark of Noah was 100. Years in building, or but near such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. Years, it were more than foolishness and madness it self, to think that such a work as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this Building there) had but 131. Years, and whereof they had spent some part in travailing from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping Hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that work 400. Years (or be it but half that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plenty of Materials and Carriages: This work of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few Years remembred. And for conclusion, let all Men of judgement weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of Men, with their Wives and Children, and Cattle, to travail 3000. Miles through Woods, Boggs, and Desarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Work of 100. Years then of 100. Days. For in the West-Indies of which the Spaniards have the experience, in those places where they found neither Path nor Guide, they have not entred the Country ten Miles in ten Years. And if Nimrod's People spent many Years by the account before remembred in passing from the East-India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, until they came into Shinaar which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the distance between those places containing 36. Degrees, which make 720. Leagues, which is 2160. Miles) and did all the way keep the Mountains and hard ground; then the difference between Babylon and Biscay is much more: for the Body of Biscay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Asturia, or Biscay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of Miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took divers Years to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. Miles: or (supposing that the Ark rested in Armenia) little above 400 Miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many Years to Gomer and Tubal to travail 3000 Miles to Countries less known unto them by far; than the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was known to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembred; but what he understood of most part of the World else it is unknown. And therefore did Annius ill advise himself to plant Gomer in Italy, and Tubal in Spain, in the tenth and twelfth of Nimrod's Reign: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one Day, or shall a Nation be born at once? But it may be objected, That the Sons of Japhet might come by Sea, and so save this great Travail through Desarts by Land. But we never read of any Navigation in those Days, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarque so great a People as we may justly suppose those Conducters carried with them, will not easily believe, that there were any Vessels in those days to transport Armies, and (withal) their Cattle, by whose Milk they lived and fed their Children: for Milk and Fruit were the Banqueting Dishes of our Forefathers. And in the eldest times, even the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Herds and numbers of their Cattle: who had Flocks of Sheep, and great Droves and Herds of their own, and their own Shepherds and Herdsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palestina, Syria, or Cilicia, he might have made good choice within the Streights, and not have overgone Granado, Valentia and other Provinces in that Tract: past the Streights of Gibralter, disdained all Andalusia and Portugall, with all those goodly Ports and Countries; and have sought out the Iron, Woody, and barren Country of the World (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the journey of the Argonaute there were scarce any Vessels that durst cross the Seas in that part of the World: and yet that which Jason had (if the tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poor one (God knows) and perchance such as they use this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but four and fifty Passengers, yet was it far greater than any of the former times:

Diod. Sicul. l. 4. c. 4. fol. 115. Erat enim antea parvarum navicularum usus: For in former times they used very small Vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gave themselves of old to far-off Navigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the invention of Ships unto them.

And for those Boats called longa naves or Gallies, Pliny saith that Ægesias ascribeth the device to Paralus: and Philostephanus to Jason: Ctesias to Samyras; and Saphanus to Semiramis: Archimachus to Ægeon: to which Invention the Erythræi are Thucyd. said to have added certain numbers of Oars: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to have increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to have brought them to four Banks: the Quinque Remi first to have been used by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which Vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans served themselves in the Punick War. But these be perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the devising of these Gallies on Sesostris, though Semiramis used them in the passage of her Army over

Plin. l. 7. c. 56. Euseb. de præp. Evang. c. 1. Tert. de Coron. Mil. Indus in Abraham's time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the Invention; and yet Tertullian (on the contrary) gives it to Minerva: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the People of those Ages, as the Ægyptians used to coast the Shores of the red Sea upon Rafts devised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Britains had a kind of Boat (with which they crost the Seas) made of small Twigs, and covered over with Leather: of which kind I have seen at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naves ex corio circumsuto in Oceano Britannico (saith Textor:) of which Lucan the Poet:

And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Ark, that then many things concerning Navigation were first revealed; yet it appears that there was much difference between the Ark of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume upon any long Voyages to Sea: at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattle: as also common Reason can tell us, that even now when this Art is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appear, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or use of Ships, fit for any long Navigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their People by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would not have been dead for so many hundred Years after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all Men else to their fancies, who have cast Nations into Countries far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which truth there is joyned both Nature, Reason, Policy, and Necessity: and to the rest, neither probability, nor possibility.

§. IV.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal and Mesech, seated first about Asia the less, out of Ezekiel. Chap. 38. 39.

NOwalthough many learned and reverend Men have formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath been and is received: yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great learned Man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus, was also in some things much mistaken: and for Josephus, as he hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errors withal, so was he in this Plantation of the World very gross and fabulous, whereby both Eusebius, Hieresolymitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that have taken his testimonies for currant, have been by him far misled. But the better to conceive what Regions of the World Gomer the first Son of Japhet possest, as also Tubal, it is needful to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures take most knowledg of Gog and Magog, which two names have troubled many Commentators, saith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that ever I read) I find most judicious in the examination of this Plantation. He takes authority from the Prophet Ezekiel chiefly, who in the 38th. and 39th. Chapter directeth us, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalianes, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of all which Gog was Prince or chief Conducter in their attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-East parts of the greater Asia, which Japhet's Issues possest, all Asia the less was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue of Japheth (whom Ezekiel spekes of) were seated hereabout, it may best appear if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependency upon the former Prophecy in the 37th. Chapter For in that 37th. Chapter, C. 37. a.

Ezekiel

Ezekiel prophesieth of the uniting of the two Kingdoms of Israel and Juda, after their delivery from Captivity.

By which prophecy of Ezekiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to give life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And David my servant shall be King over them, and they shall have one shepherd, (that is) they shall be united as they were in David's time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezekiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seek to impeach this Union, and disturb the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receive to Grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their return, and sought to subiect them: all which were the Subiects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Cœlesyrians, next bordering Palestina or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the less, which lay North from Judea. The words of Ezekiel are these: Son of man set thy face against Gog, and against the land of Magog the chief Princes of Mesech (or Mosoch) and Tubal: and afterward. Behold, I come against the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal: and in the sixth Verse; Gomer and all his bands, and the house of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezekiel having first delivered the purpose of his prophecy, teacheth what Nations they were, that should in vain assail Israel. He joyneth them together under their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how seated and joyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith St. Hierom) tectum or covering of a house: and Pintus upon Ezekiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith he) Antichristus erit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana; That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devil under humane form. He addeth that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the letter [M] being an Hebrew Præposition, and importeth as much as of or from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So far Pintus; at least in this not amiss, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation, with which agreeth this observation of Beroaldus. Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter [He] which is used but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrews call Heliasedia) is never added to proper Names of men but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or according to others the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech, (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 39 Chapter is made manifest. Behold, I come against thee Gog the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal. This must needs be meant by the Successors of Seleucus Nicanor, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seek to make the Jews their Tributaries only, but endeavoured by all means, and by all kind of violence to extinguish the Religion it self (which the Hebrews profest) and the acknowledging of one True God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortal and rotten Gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images. S. Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabout. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela derives the Turks from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others of a Region: others for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Junius, who says that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greek stories call Gyges: who in former time having slain Candaules the Lydian, gave his own name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Gygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) forty furlongs from Sardis. Pliny calleth it Gygeum stagnum. Herodotus and Nicander set it about the Rivers of Hyllus, and Maander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after he had subdued the Country about the River Rhodius which runneth into the Hellespont, called the Promontory Trapese after his own name Gyges. These Opinions do also seem to strengthen that of Junius. For Magog, saith he, is that part of Asia the less, which Halyattes obtained; and after him his Son Crœsus; who (as Junius further notes) having mastered all those Regions as far South as Libanus, in that border built the City Gigarta or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the City of Gog) seated in Cœlesyria, whose People were the ancient Enemies of the Jews.

Now that Magog is found in Cœlesyria, Pliny affirmeth, saying; Cœlesyria habet Bambycen, quæ alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, Syris vero Magog: Cœlesyria hath in it Bambyce, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians, Magog. He further telleth us that the monstrous Idol Atergatis, called by the Greeks Derceto, was here worshipped; Lucian makes mention hereof, saying that the City had anciently another Name, which yet he expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog; as sounding nothing elegantly in the Greek. But if we may believe Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idol was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtful whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough be that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certain it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subject unto the Kings of the Race of Seleucus. Now I do not condemn the Opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Josephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also be the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the Nations of Cœlesyria and the North parts adjoining be meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might be propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to be denied, that the Scythians in old times coming out of the North-East wasted the better part of Asia the less, and possest Cœlesyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezekiel had reference, it is very plain: for this City Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Judæa, according to the words of Ezekiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Ptolomies Kings of Ægypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successours of Seleucus, the successour of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrius thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rages, mentioned in the Story of Tobias. Pliny takes it not only to have been called Bambyce, as we have said, but also Edessa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name; now the known name is Allepo: for so Bellonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This City had the Title of Sacred as the Sacred City, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatry; and wherein was worshipped the the Idol of the Mermaid Atergatis, or Atirgitis, according to Pliny, which the Greeks call Dercето.

If then we conser the words of Ezekiel in the third Verse of the thirty eight Chapter, wherein he joyneth together Gog, Meſech, and Tubal: and withall remember that Hierapolis was the City of Magog, which alſo is ſeated directly North from Judea: with whom alſo Ezekiel coupleth Gomer, and all his Bands of the North Quarters; we may (as I conceive) ſafely conclude, that theſe followers and Vaſſals of Gog (which were Northern Nations in reſpect of Judea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a People of the leſſer Aſia, and Cœleſyria: and therefore that the Opinions of Beroſus, Joſephus, and whoſoever elſe hath followed them therein are to be rejected. But if Joſephus refer himſelf to later times, and think that ſome Colony of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Aſia paſs into Spain (to wit from that piece of Land between Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania: (moſt part poſſeſſed by the Georgians) then is his Judgment of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of Opinions, it may be granted, that in proceſs of time theſe People might from their firſt Habitation paſs into the Countries near the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after Ages into Spain.

Joſephus makes mention of the Iberi, ſaying, that they were anciently called Thobelos, as of Tubal; from whence (ſaith Juſtine) they paſſed into Spain to ſearch out the Mines of that Region: having belike underſtood that it was a Southerly Country and mountainous. For it ſeemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes lived altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witneſſeth in theſe following Verſes, telling how the Argonauts did viſit them.

Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas ſcindit ſub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta miniſtrant.

The Chalybes plough not their barren Soil,
But undermine high Hills for Iron Veins:
Changing the purchace of their endleſs toil
For Merchandiſe, which their poor Lives ſuſtains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was firſt Peopled by the Africans, who had ever ſince an affection to return thither, and to repeople it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were eaſily drawn to paſs over the Streights into that Country; and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred Years, till the time of Ferdinand and Iſabel. And either of theſe Opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth Year of Nimrod's Reign, Tubal paſt into Spain, and therein built St. Uval: a poor Town, and poor Device, God knows. Certain it is that we muſt find Moſoch or Meſech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togorma not far off, or elſe we ſhall wrong Ezekiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Meſech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togorma their Aſſiſtants. And that Meſech inhabited Aſia, Functius (though he followed Beroſus) confeſſeth, for theſe be his words. Meſacus, qui à Moſe Meſech, priſcos Meſios ab Adula monte uſque ad Ponticam regionem poſuit: hæc regio poſtea Cappadocia dicta eſt, in qua urbs Mazica, &c. hæc eſt terra Magog principalis: Meſacus, whom Moſes calleth Meſech, placed the ancient Meſians from the Mount Adulas, unto the Coaſt of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Town Mazica, &c. this is the principal Country of Magog. And this doth Annius alſo avow, and yet forgers that Gog was Prince both of Meſech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spain lying directly Weſt, and not North from Judea. Alſo Ezekiel in the 27 Chapter, where he propheſieth of the deſtruction of Tyre, nameth Meſech and Tubal jointly. And for a final Proof, that theſe Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how far ſoever ſtretched) Ezekiel in the 38 Chapter makes them all Horſemen. Thou, and much People with thee, all ſhall ride upon Horſes, even a great multitude and a mighty. Then if any Man believe that theſe Troops came out of Spain over the Pyrenes, and firſt paſſed over a part of France, Italy, Hungary, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued again about the Helleſpont, or elſe compaſſed all Pontus Euxinus, to come into the leſſer Aſia, which is half the length or compaſs of the then known World, he may be called a ſtrong Believer, but he ſhall never be juſtified thereby. But on the contrary it is known, that Seleucis was a Province neighbouring Paleſtina or Judea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) joyned unto it: whoſe Princes commanded all Syria, and Aſia the leſs, (namely the Seleucidæ; and held it, till Scipio Aſiaticus overthrew Antiochus the great: after which they yet poſſeſt Syria till the the time of Tigranes: and whether Heſhech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the ſame Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be ſaid. Firſt he ſeated himſelf with Togorma, not far from Magog and Tubal, in the Borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Aſia the leſs; and in long tract of time his valiant Iſſue filled all Germany, reſted long in France and Britain, and poſſeſſed the utmoſt Borders of the Earth, accompliſhing (as Melanthon well notes) the ſignification of their Parents Name, which is Utmoſt Bordering. But when theſe Borderers wanted further place, whereinto they might exonerate their ſwelling Multitudes, that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they return upon the Nations, occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly paſſed, oppreſſing firſt their Neighbours, afterwards the People more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy Reſtorer of our Antiquities, Mr. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth ſignifie Robbers; Neceſſity inforcing them to ſpoil their Neighbours, to whom in their Original they were as near joyned, as afterwards in the Seats which they poſſeſſed. For that the warlike Nations of Germany were in elder Ages accuſtomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the Authority of Cæſar affirming it, is proof ſufficient. But in times following they purſued richer Conqueſts, and more eaſie though further diſtant, by which (to omit their other Enterpriſes not here to be ſpoken of) they were drawn at length into Aſia the leſs, and occupied thoſe Parts, which had formerly been held by their Progenitors. I ſay not that they claimed thoſe Lands as theirs by Deſcent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their own Pedigree. Neither can any Man therefore deny, that they were of old ſeated in Aſia, becauſe in late Ages they returned thither; unleſs he will think, that all thoſe Nations which from far Parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument be proved not to have iſſued from thence at the firſt.

Now concerning Samothes (for his excellent Wiſdom ſirnamed Dis) whom Annius makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother Moſes never heard of, who ſpake his knowledge of Japhet's Sons) they must find him in some old Poet: for Funccius a great Berosian confesseth: Quis hic Samothes fuerit incertum est: Who this Samothes was it is uncertain; neither is their any proof that he was that same Dis, whom Cæsar saith the Gauls suppose to be their Ancestor; yea and Vignier confesseth with Funccius: Mais on ne sçayt qui il estoit: No Man knows who he was.

Japhet's

Cæsar Comment. Vign. pars 1. Chron.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his Fiction. That the Italian Janus was Noah.

BUT before I go on with Noah his Sons, I think it necessary to disprove the Fiction which Annius hath of Noah himself: an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as he hath wrested) by those Authors of whom himself hath commented: as the fragment of Berosus, Fabius Pictor, Cato, Lavinius and others. For Annius seeks to perswade us, that Noah (firnamed Janus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italy, wherein he lived 92 Years. This to disprove, by Moses's silence, is a sufficient Argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne and Nineveh by Nimrod, Noah was a Man of too great mark to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 9[illegible] Years. But it were a needless labour for me to disprove the Authority of that Berosus, on whom Annius groundeth, seeing so many learned Men have so demonstratively proved that fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Assyrian in his Oration against the Greeks avoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote only three Books, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicanor: But Annius hath devised five Books, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled only the estate of the Chaldæans and Assyrians, Annius hath filled this fragment with the business of all the World. And if we may believe Eusebius better than Annius, then all the Kings of the Latins (before Æneas) consumed but 150 Years: whereas no Man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Æneas's arrival into Italy there past 1126 (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Booz, in the Worlds Year (as some reckon) 2717, after the Flood 1064, and Noah died 350 Years after the Flood: and so there past between Janus of Italy and Noah firnamed Janus 704 Years. For Saturnus succeeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Faunus after Picus, and Latinus followed Faunus: which Latinus lived at once with Tautanes the 27th King of Assyria: with Pelasgus of Peloponnesus: with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Judge of Israel. Now all these five Kings of the Latins having consumed but one hundred and fifty Years; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for one hundred and fifty Year, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

True it is, that the Greeks had their Janus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the Son of Xuthus, the Son of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Ions, who were indeed the Children of Javan, the fourth Son of Japhet. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Javan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the Son of Medea, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, though they were descended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third Son of Japhet.

Lastly we see by a true experience, that the British Language hath remained among us above 2000 Years, and the English Speech ever since the Invasion of the Angles: and the same continuance have all Nations observed among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is strange if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italy his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plain resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could have quite extinguished) should have been found in the Languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personal Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italy, Spain, or France, are meerly fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the same Grecian Janus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the Fall of Troy but 150 Years, (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinus the fifth King; which also S. Augustine and Justine confirm: and this agreeth with Reason, Time, and Possibility. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanity, I may out of themselves add thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camasena) the Wife of this Janus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latins and Romans taking from Janus all their idolatrous and heathenish Ceremonies) there is no Man so impious, as to believe that Noah himself, (who is said by Moses to have walked with God, to be a just Man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the True and only God, or so wicked and ungrateful, to set up or devise any Heathen Salvage, or Idolatrous Adoration, or have instituted any Ceremony, contrary to that which he knew best pleasing to God himself.

§. VI.

That Gomer also and his Son Togarma of the Posterity of Japhet were first seated about Asia the less: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turn now to the Sons of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Flood: therein I observe, that as both reason and necessity taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repair to each other, and keep intelligence by River: because the Land was yet desart and overprest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus took the South-part of Chaldæa, down the River of Gehon, by which he might pass to and fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the race of Shem, inhabiting at Ur or Orchoa near the Lakes of Chaldæa, might by the same River get up to Babylon, and receive succour from thence. All which Tract of Land upon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Cush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Cushite, by whom the Children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stated not in the East) were for a while oppress, till God afterward by the Seed of Abraham made them his own Nation and victorious.

victorious. Havilah, the Brother of Nimrod, and Son of Cush, took both Banks of Tygris, especially on the East-side of the River: by which River his People might also pass to and fro to Babel.

The Imperial Seat of which Region of Havilah or Susian, was anciently called Chusian, or Chusan, afterward Susa. Cush himself took the Banks of Gehon, and planted those Countries West-ward, and Southwest-ward towards Arabia the stony, and the Desart, where Ptolomy placeth the City of Chusidia, first Chusia.

Ptol. Asiæ. tab. 4.

Seba, and Sheba with the rest that planted Arabia Fœlix, had Tigris to convey them into the Persian Gulf, which washeth the Banks of Arabia Fœlix on the East-side: so as those Sons of Cush might take Land down the River as they pleased. Also the City of Niniveh was by Nimrod founded on the said River of Tigris: and from thence a Colony past to Charran, standing also upon a Navigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Japhet's Sons settle themselves together, and took their Seats in Asia the less from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, sate down first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phœnicia: and from thence Gomer or his Children past on into Asia the less, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the less, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witness Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greeks called Galatia, to whom S. Paul wrote his Epistle, so intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the invincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gave names to divers places; as to the Mountains above Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the City of Cymmeris in Phrygia: also Bosphorus Cymmerius took Appellation from this Nation, in the outlet whereof was also a City of that name called Cymmerian: which Pliny saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Town in Campania, so called of the unhealthful Waters, savouring of Brimstone: which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the Water of the Lake Lucrinus.

The Children of Tubal ranged as far as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezekiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meschech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptolomy calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountains Moschici, in the Valley between the Mountains Moschici, and the Mountains Pariardes: out of whose North-part springeth the River Phasis; from the East-part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meschech are descended also the Moscovians (saith Melanchthon) and it may be, that in process of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melanchthon) signifieth extendens, enlarging or stretching forth. Togorma also at first did inhabit amongst his Parents and Kindred. The Togormians were also called Giblei, a People neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Phœnicia, the same which Pliny calleth Gabon: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Masons, which hewed Stones for the Temple of Jerusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the less Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hierosolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary: forgetting the Prophecy of Ezekiel against the Tyrians. They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy fairs horses, and horsemen, and mules, which could not well be driven over the whole length of the Mediterran Sea, but from the neighbour Countrys by Land. But Josephus takes them for the Parents of the Phrygians; which I do not deny, but they might be in the ensuing Ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred Years after the twelfth of Nimrod's Reign. The Jews conceive that the Turks came of those Togormians, because their Emperour is called Togar. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirms, that the Turks descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Moscovia. But for these subderivations it were infinite to examine them. Only of the first and second Plantation, and of the first Nations after the Flood is the matter which I labour to discover; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must note, that those Grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet spirit, or (perchance) of less understanding, and had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations can be hardly known: only Reason hath taught us, that they dwelt among the rest, and were covered with the fame of others, who took on them the Conduction and Dominion over the rest.

Of Javan the fourth Son of Japhet: and of Mesch of Aram, and Meshech of Japhet.

OF Javan the fourth Son of Japhet came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greeks: and so the Latin and Greek Interpreters for Javan write Greece, as in Isaiah. Et mittam ex iis qui salvati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italiam, & Græciam: And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Grecce. The Geneva here useth the word [Tarshich] for Tarsus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarsis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneva use the names Tubal and Javan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of these Iones were the Athenians, though themselves dream that they were Aborigines, or Men without Ancestors, and growing (as it were) out of the Soil it self: who abounding in People, sent Colonies into Asia the less, of whom came the Iones of those parts. Others derive the Athenians from Ion the Son of Xuthus, the Son of Deucalion; but the Antiquity of Javan marrs the Fashion of that supposition, who so many Years preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tells us that Xuthus stole out of Thessaly with all his Fathers Treasure, and his Brothers Portions, and arriving at Athens, he was graciously received by Erictheus, who gave him his Daughter in Marriage; of whom he received two Sons, Ion, and Achæus, the supposed Ancestors of the Athenians. For Attica was called Ionia (saith Plutarch in the Life of Theseus) who, when he had joyned Megara to Attica, erected a Pillar in that Isthmus or Strait, which fasteneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece, writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these theſe words. Hæc non ſunt Peloponneſus, aſt Ionia. Theſe Countries are not of Peloponneſus, but of Ionia; and on the other ſide which looketh towards the South and into Peloponneſus, this. Theſe parts are Peloponneſus, and not Ionia.

L. 18. de civit. De. c. 10.

Strabo out of Hecatæus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Aſia into Greece, which is contrary to the former Opinion: That the Iones of Greece tranſporting certain Companies into Aſia the leſs, the Name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than he learned of the Greeks themſelves, yet I find this Conjecture of Hecatæus reaſonable enough. For though it were to him unknown, yet ſure I am that Aſia the leſs had People before Greece had any: and that Javan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but took Aſia the leſs in his paſſage; and from thence paſt over the neareſt way, leaving his own Name to ſome maritimate Province on that ſide, as he did that part of Greece ſo called. But yet Strabo himſelf believed, that Ionia took the Name from Ion the Son of Xuthus: for ſo much he had learned from themſelves; which was alſo the Opinion of Pauſanias. True it is, that the Greeks in after-times caſt themſelves into that part of Aſia the leſs, oppoſite unto them, which they held for divers Years. And howſoever the Greeks vaunt themſelves to be the Fathers of Nations, and the moſt ancient; yet all approved Hiſtorians (not their own) deride and diſprove their Pride, and Vanity therein. For this Diſpute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) reſted between the Scythians and the Ægyptians, as Juſtine out of Trogus, in the War between Vexoris of Ægypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witneſſeth: which preceded far the Reign of Ninus, and was long before the Name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is alſo manifeſt, that in Cecrops's time the Greeks were all Salvages without Law or Religion, living like brute Beaſts in all reſpects: and Cecrops (ſaith St. Auguſtine) lived together with Moſes.

L. 18. de civit. Dei c. 10.

The ſixth Son of Japheth was Meſhech, whom the Septuagint call Moſoch: (a part of thoſe Nations commanded by Gog the chief Prince of Meſhech and Tubal.) But this we muſt remember, that between Meſeth the Son of Aram, and Meſhech (or Moſoch) the Son of Japheth, there is a little difference in the Name, and both by divers Interpreters diverſly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writteth Meſch, the Son of Aram Mes; the Geneva Maſh; Junius Meſch. But it may be gathered out of the 120 Pſalm, that either Meſhech the Son of Japheth, was the Parent of thoſe People, or gave Name to that Province wherein David hid himſelf: or elſe (which may rather ſeem) that it took Name from Meſch the Son of Aram. For David bewailing his Exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People) uſeth theſe words. Wo is me that I remain in Meſech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Junius converteth thus. Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habito tanquam Scenita Kedareni: The Septuagint gives it this Senſe, Wo is me becauſe my Habitation (or Abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar; with which this of the Latine agreeth. Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus eſt, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldæan otherwiſe, and in theſe words, O me miſerum, quia peregrinatus ſum Aſianis, habitavi cum tabernaculis Arabum: O wretch, that I am, for I have travelled among thoſe of Aſia: I have dwelt in the Tabernacle of the Arabians. But howſoever or which ſoever converſion be taken for the beſt, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia petræa; and the Chaldæan putteth Aſia in ſtead of Meſech; but the Hebrew it ſelf hath Moſech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, as it is moſt likely, becauſe it anſwers to Kedar, the Name of a Nation) ſeeing Meſh the Son of Aram, 1 Chron. 17. is called Meſhec, it is indifferent whether this Nation took Name from Moſhech or Meſh, both bordering Judea, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for ſo Ezekiel makes Meſech and Tubal. But as for thoſe that take Meſech out of the word Moſoch (given by the Septuagint,) to be the Muſcovian: ſure they preſume much upon the affinity of Names, as aforeſaid. And ſure I am that David never travelled ſo far North; (for to him Muſcovia was utterly unknown) but about the Border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his perſecution: the ſame being a City on the Mountains of Sanir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Moſoch the Father of the Muſcovians: and herein alſo Melanthon runs with the Tide of common Opinion, and ſets Meſech in Muſcovia, though with ſome better advice of Judgment; as, firſt ſeated in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120 Pſalm, [Hei mihi quòd exulo in Meſech] to ſignifie, gentis ejus feritatem inſignem eſſe; that the Ferity of that Nation exceeded: which fierceneſs or brutality of the Muſcovians, David never proved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the ſame Ferity or Cruelty which thoſe Northern Muſcovians had, may as well be aſcribed to the Arabians and Kederens. For this Country took Name of Kedar the ſecond Son of Iſhmael, of whom a People of equal fierceneſs to any of the World were begotten, both in thoſe times and long after, even to this day, (if the Arabians, Iſhmaelites, and Saracens may be accounted one People:) the ſame being foreſhewed by the ſpeech of the Angel to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he ſhall be a wild man: his hand ſhall be againſt every man, and every mans hand againſt him. Now Arabia the Deſart (ſaith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the Eaſt, and the Cedrei Southward, both which joyn together upon the Nabathei. So it appeareth (as before) that Meſech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Iſrael, and that Kedar alſo did joyn to Meſech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Aſia the leſs, commanded by the Succeſſors of Seleucus, enemies of the Re-eſtabliſhment of Iſrael and Juda. But as (I have already ſaid) it might well be, that long after the firſt Plantation the Iſſue of Meſech (or Moſoch) might paſs into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and give Names, both to Mazega in the one, and to the Mountains Moſchici in the other, and from thence might ſend People more Northerly into Muſcovia: and ſo all Opinions ſaved. But all ſalvage Nations overgrown and uncultivated, do (for the moſt part) ſhew a late Plantation, even as Civility, Letters, and magnificent Buildings, witneſs Antiquity.

Pſal. 120. v. 5.

Tiras the ſeventh Son of Japheth, which Montanus reckons among the Sons of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirm. Joſephus was the firſt that determined hereof: and becauſe the Scriptures are altogether ſilent, what part of the World Tiras peopled, the Conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of Diſpute. It followeth now to ſpeak of the Sons of Gomer, which were three:

Montan. in Chr.

{ Aſcanez, Riphath, and Togorma. }

§. VIII.

Of Aſcanez and Riphath, the two elder Sons of Gomer.

Aſcanez was the Father of thoſe which the Greeks call Rhegini, (ſaith Joſephus) but he gives no Reaſon why.

Euſebius makes Aſcanez the Father of the Goths. The Jews in their Thargum make him the Root of the German Nation, but their expoſitions are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Aſcania in Phrygia, near the Rivers of Hylas and Cios: Melanchthon being of the ſame opinion, that the Tuiſcones were deſcended of the Aſcanez, (for Tuiſcones, ſaith he, is as much to ſay, as of the Aſcanez, præpoſito articulo die Aſcanez) and that the Word ſignifieth a Religious Keeper of Fire: it being an ancient ſuperſtition to pray at the Fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Not far from Phrygia was the Lake Aſcania, known by that name in the Romans time. And among the Kings which came to the ſuccour of Troy, was Aſcanius (Deo ſimilis, ſaith Homer) like unto God: becauſe he was beautiful and ſtrong: for in the ſame manner doth Virgil grace Æneas, Os humeroſq; Deo ſimilis, in face and Body like one of the Gods. Virgil alſo remembreth ſuch a River together with the Hills Gargara: as Illas ducit amor trans Gargara, tranſq; ſonantem Aſcanium: Appetite leads them both over the Mountains Gargara, and the roaring Aſcanius. But this Pliny maketh more plain in the deſcription of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion upon the River Aſcanius, which is adjoining to Milia, and is near the border of the Trojan Empire: and the Lake Aſcanez he directs us to find by the deſcription of Pruſia, founded by Hannibal at the Foot of Olympus, which lyeth far within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Pruſia to Nicea are accounted five and twenty Miles, in which way this Lake lyeth, even between Pruſia and Nicea. And ſo Junius (as I conceive him) takes them of Aſcanez, to be the Inhabitants of Pontus, and Bithynia, and thoſe North parts of Aſia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a City of Troâs, built by Aſcanius the Son of Æneas: ſaying, that there was another of that name in Myſia. Of Aſcanii, a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolomy witneſſeth: and Strabo giveth Aſcania, both a Lake, a River, and a Town in Myſia, near unto Cio; which alſo agreeth with Pliny. For Pliny findeth Pruſia, (before ſpoken of) near Cio and calleth the Iſlands before Troy Aſcanes.

Melanct. in car. l. 1.

Hom. Iliad. 2.

Virg Georg. l. 3.

Now whether theſe places took name of Aſcanez the Son of Gomer, or of Aſcanius the Son of Æneas, it might be queſtioned: ſure it is, that Aſcanius which brought ſuccour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Æneas's Son, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it ſeemeth that the Countries whence thoſe ſuccours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia, or Myſia, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Aſia the leſs, which by Hieremy is called Aſcanez, by the figure Synecdoche, as Junius thinketh. Out of thoſe teſtimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremy we ſhall learn of what Nation the Aſcenez were, whoſe words are theſe: Set up a Standard in the land, blow the trumpet among the Nations againſt her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Aſcanez againſt her, &c. meaning, againſt the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as moſt Interpreters conſent, ſo called of the Mountains of Ararat which run through it: Minni the leſſer Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (ſaith Junius and others before him) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coaſts of Phœnicia and Paleſtina; and therefore Meſopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the Story of Jacob and Eſau, and call it Aram-padam. Then if theſe two Nations were of the Armenians, and Aſcanez joyned with them (who altogether united under Cyrus and Darius, came to the ſpoil of the Babylonian Empire) we ſhall err much to call Aſkenaz Germany or Almain, for we hear of no Swart Rutters at that Siege. But the Aſkenaz were of thoſe Nations which were either ſubject or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the diſperſion of Nations was in after-times without account. But for the opinion of Euſebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Joſephus, who calls them Rhegini: or of the Jews, who will have them to be Almains; when they confirm it either by Scriptures or Reaſon, I will think as they do.

C. 51. v. 27.

Of Riphath the ſecond Son of Gomer there is mention in the firſt of Chronicles. Beroaldus and Pererius think that he wandered far off from the reſt of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his plantation. But I ſee nothing to the contrary, but that he might ſeat himſelf with the reſt of his Family; for there wanted no room or ſoil in thoſe days for all the Sons and Grand-Children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well underſtood, that the Riphei were of Riphath, which the Greeks afterwards (according to Joſephus) called the Paphlagones: and Riphei (ſaith Melanchthon) ſignifieth Giants. Theſe People were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the moſt of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greateſt number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who ſpake the ancient Polac: which being firſt called Riphei (for the love of ſome of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a cuſtom exceeding common in thoſe times) and dwelt firſt in Paphlagonia, as Homer witneſſeth, and ſo doth Apollonius in his Argonanticks: Now, when theſe Riphei (afterward Heneti) ſought new Regions, they came along the Shores of Euxinus, and filled the North part of Europe, containing Ruſſia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they croſt thwart the Land, and Peopled Illyria, deſirous (ſaith Melanchthon) of a warmer ſoil of Fruit and Wine. Theſe Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchthon taketh to be one People, filled all that Land between the Baltick and Adriatick Sea; and to this day the name of the Gulf Venedicus is found in Ruſſia. This Nation, after they were poſſeſs'd of Lithuania and Polonia, diſturbed the plantation of the Boii and Hermonduri. Therefore, it ſeemeth to me, that of Riphath came the Riphei, afterward Heneti; and ſo thinketh Arias Montanus, firſt ſeated in Paphlagonia, but in courſe of time Lords of Sarmatia, and thoſe other parts before remembred, chiefly between the Rivers of Viſtula and Albis. The name (ſaith Melanchthon) ſignifieth wandering or wanderers, or Nomades: a People which lived by white meats and Fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the firſt Ages.

Melanct. in Catin.

Of the third Son of Gomer, Togorma, I have ſpoken already; now therefore of Javan's Children, which were four:

Eliſa, Tharſis.
Cethim, Dodanim,

Of the four Sons of Javan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name or for the Sea.

OF Elisa or Elipha, came the Æoles: and of this Elisa all the Greeks were Elischa called Hellenes, saith Mamanus. Melanthon makes Elisa the Father of the Æoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus, or of both. And seeing the Greeks were descended in general of Javan, it is probable that the Æoles and the Elei, took name of Elisa, his eldest Son. Ezekiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa. Hyacyntho & purpura de Insulis Elisa fuit operimentum tuum: Blue Silk and Purple, brought from the Isles of Elisa, was thy covering: The Chaldeans for Elisa write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneva, and Junius, keep the Word Elisa: and so I think they might do with reason. For there was not not found any such Purple Dye in Italy in those days, not since, that I can read of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better conjecture the Isles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it self, and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the Coast of Getulia. v. 7.

Tharsis, the second Son of Javan inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Mamanus for Tharsis in Cilicia, understands Carthage in Africa; but (reserving the respect due to so learned a Man) he was much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority, nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Salomon went every three Years to Tharsis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants Teeth, &c. the Chaldean Paraphrast translates Tharsis [Africa.] But Salomon's Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Esion Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, near unto Madian, where Jethro (Moses Father-in-law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petræa, Idumæa, or of the Chusites; and they sailed to the higher part of the East India. For it had been a strange Navigation to have spent three Years in the passage between Judea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might have been sailed in six or ten days. And if so great Riches might have been found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all other neighbouring Princes would soon have entertained that trade also. But this enterprise of Salomon is in this sort written of in the first of Kings: Also King Salomon made a Navy of Ships in Esion Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brink of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyram sent with the Navy his servants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the Servants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and fet from thence 420. talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the World like unto their own, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that only, (whereof it came that Pontus was a word used for the Sea in general) so because the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Sea than that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the People of Tharsis had the greatest Ships, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called Men of the Sea: and the word Tharsis used often for the Sea. And whereas it's said that the Ships of Salomon went every three Years to Tharsis, that Phrase is not strange at all: for we use it ordinarily whersoever we navigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out every Year, or every three Year to the Sea; and therefore Tharsis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but used for the Sea it self. But in this place Tharsis is truly taken for Tharsis, the chief City in Cilicia, founded by Tharsis the second Son of Javan, or by his Successors in memory of their first parent. To this City arrived Alexander Macedon, before he gave the first overthrow to Darius, and casting himself into the River to bath and wash his Body, he fell into an extreme Fever, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharsis was St. Paul born. Now this agreeth with the Reason and Nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other Sons inhabiting, Asia the less, and that part of Syria adjoining,) Javan who was to pass over the Sea into Greece, took the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Ions on that shore: gave the Islands between Asia the less and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharsis upon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that City took name.

The third Son of Javan was Cethim, of whom were the Romans and Italians, saith Beroaldus; but I allow better of Melanthon's opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural (saith he) and signifieth percussores, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Esay 23. (according to Melanthon) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians. Hæc calamitas ab Esaï prædicta est, qui capite vicesimo tertio inquit, venturos esse eversores Tyri ex terra Cittim: This calamity (saith Melanthon) was foreshewed by Esai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the destroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cittim. And although the Children of Israel esteemed all Men Islanders, which came unto them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cittim might be taken for Italy, saith Beroaldus) yet we must take the first performance of the former Prophecy, which took effect with the destruction of the Tyrians by Alexander: who after seven Months Siege entred that proud City, and cut in pieces 7000. principal Citizens; strangled 2000. and changed the freedom of 13000. others into Bondage and Slavery. Now, that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it appeareth plainly in the first of the Maccabees, in these words: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the Son of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians and Medes. Josephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith he) there remaineth the City Citium, the Country of Zeno the Philosopher (witness Laertius) which City Pintus upon Ezekiel affirmeth, that it stood in St. Hierome's time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrews were called the Islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly over against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his Brother Tharsis: and finding that Island too streight for his People after they were increased, and that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colonies over the Ægean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth Son of Javan, and the youngest Brother (by the most opinions) sate down at Rhodes as near Cethim, Tharsis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are used indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew [D] and the Hebrew [R] are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Province of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted Soil in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far less Island (did of necessity send his People farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little farther on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the City of Dodona was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himself, yet his Posterity might give it that name in memory of their first Parent, as it hapened all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountains, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noah's Children, and Grand-Children; not in all places by themselves, but by their Successours many Years after: every of their Families being desirous to retain among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdoms were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished: therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountains and Rivers, as to things (after their judgements) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himself and his Children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the less, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Japhet their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Javan's Brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Meshech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chush (the Son of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldea, and the borders thereof towards the West and Southwest: and the Sons of Chush (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it self) travailed Southward in Arabia Felix, and Southwestward into Arabia Petraa: the rest of his Children holding the Regions adjoyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the Brother of Chush in like manner took the way of Ægypt: and his Brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adjoining. The Sons of Canaan had their Portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the Sons of Shem, which spred themselves towards the West, and the Borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speak hereafter. But first of the Sons of Cham or Ham, which were four:

{Chush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.}

§. X.

That the seat of Chush the eldest Son of Ham was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill translations of Scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Æthiopess Wife to Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Cush.

THat Ham was the Father of the Ægyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm v. 51. Then Israel came to Ægypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the Land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm. He slew all the first-born in Ægypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also found a great City in Thebaida, called Cheramis; (as it were, the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discovers an Island in the same Region. But because Chush is the elder Son of Ham, it agreeth with order to speak first of him. Now though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chush could not be Æthiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turn to speak for himself, I will add some farther proof to the former. For the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senseless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Josephus have herein failed, yet it is manifest that Chush could not be Æthiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petraea; and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desart: which Regions Chush and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first sate down all together. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this controversie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speak of Nabuchodonosor's conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, understand Chush for Æthiopia, we must give credit to Moses himself herein; and then it will appear that Josephus was grosly mistaken, or vainly led by his own invention. For Josephus presuming that Cush was Æthiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture Num. 12. v. 1. is called a Woman of Cush) was a Woman of the Land of Æthiopia, feigneth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Æthiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers City; and to the end to obtain Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City it self, and to deliver it into Moses's hands. The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Josephus. After he had described the strength of the Æthiopian City Meroe, which he saith at length Cambyses called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words. Hic cùm Moses desidere exercitum otiosum egrè ferret, hoste non audente manus conserere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Æthiopum regi filia, nomine Tharbis, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English. When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged, durst not sally and come to handy strokes, there hapned this accident in the mean while. The Æthiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults given beheld the person of Moses, and withal admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not only upheld and restored the falling estate of the Ægyptians, but had also brought the conquering Æthiopians to the very brink of subversion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her own affection, which daily encreased, she made means to send unto him by one of her trustiest Servants to offer her self unto him, and become his Wife; Which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the City into his possession: whereunto she condescending, and Moses having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

A dispute against the Tale of Josephus.

THis Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himself, in naming a City of Arabia, for a City of Æthiopia: as he names Æthiopia it self to have been the Country of Moses his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Æthiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, Ancient and Modern, teach us, saying that the Sabæans are Arabians, and not Æthiopians; except Josephus can perswade us, that the Queen of Saba which came from the South to hear the Wisdom of Salomon, were a Negro, or Black-Moor. And though Damianus à Goes speak of certain Letters to the King of Portugal from Prester John of the Abissines: wherein that Æthiopian King would perswade the Portugals that he was descended of the Queen of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appear in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Son by that great Princess: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sisthac King of Ægypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Son of Saba and Salomon) who joined upon Ægypt, would both have impeached that Enterprize, as also given Aid and Succour to Roboam against Jeroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his own Obedience. Neither is it any thing against our Opinion of Moses his Wife, to have been an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Moses married the Daughter of Jethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, over against the Body of Ægypt, and near Esion Gaber, where Salomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumæa joineth to the Tribe of Juda by the North, to Arabia Petræa by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South East. And if we mark the way which Moses took when he left Ægypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appear that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it self, he had formerly lived forty Years; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing up in Ægypt, he was instructed by Jethro in the Ægyptian Learning. For Josephus confesseth, and St. Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the Wisdom of the Ægyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Josephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses fled from Pharao, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Æthiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plain as words can express, in what Region Madian was, where it is written. When Moses kept the sheep of Jethro his Father-in-law, Priest of Madian, and drave the flock to the Desart, and came to the Mountain of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Æthiopia, every Infant knoweth. And if we may believe Moses himself, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Josephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Country and Friends) neither had she the Name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was she a Negro, but a Madianitish. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his People first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a Stranger) defended the Daughters of Reguel from the other Shepherds, and drew them Water to water their Sheep: upon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whose Daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Towns or Countries.

From hence also came Jethro to Moses at Rephidim, not far from Idumæa, and finding the insupportable Government of such a Multitude, he advised him to distribute this weighty charge, and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Family. And if Jethro had been an Æthiopian, it had been a far progress for him to have passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to have found Moses in the border of Idumæa: the Ægyptians hating Moses and all that favoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petræa (which joineth to Madian) proveth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts: in which the second time he wandered forty Years, and did by these late Travails of his seek to instruct the Children of Israel in the knowledg of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished up with the Milk of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiff Plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Desarts, as God directed, and grafted their Branches anew, that from those he might receive Fruit, agreeable to his own desire, and Gods Commandments.

Lastly, this opinion of Josephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrisamensis, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who avowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His own words have this beginning. Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Mosen, &c. Apollinaris also lyeth in affirming that Moses had two Wives: and who doth not perceive these things feigned by them? for it is manifest that the Wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Æthiopia beyond Ægypt; being the same that joineth to Arabia: so far Chrisamensis. *Sixt. †. III.

Chus ill expounded for Æthiopia, Ezek. 29. 10.

NOW as Chush is by the Septuagint converted Æthiopia, and the Wife of Moses therefore called Æthiopissa: so in the Conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Æthiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezekiel it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was never in Æthiopia. Behold (saith Ezekiel; speaking of the Person of this great Assyrian) I come upon thee and upon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Ægypt utterly wast and desolate, from the Tower of Seveneh, even to the borders of the Black-Moors: which last words should have been thus converted: From the Tower of Seveneh to the borders of the Chusites or Arabians: between which two is situated all Ægypt. For to say, from the borders of Seveneh to the Æthiopians, hath no sense at all. Seveneh it self being the border of Ægypt, confronting and joining to Æthiopia, or the Land of the Black-Moors. So as if Nabuchodonosor's Conquest had been but between Seveneh and the border of Æthiopia, it were as much to say, and did express no other Victory than the Conquest of all that Land and Country, lying between Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countries join together; or all the North parts of England, between Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the same sense with the Ezek. 29. 10.

the former, if any Man ſought to expreſs by theſe two bounds, the Conqueſt of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seveneh or Syene is the South bound of Ægypt, ſeated in Thebaida which toucheth Æthiopia. But by the words of Ezekiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonoſor never entred into any part of Æthiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other (in effect) have written Æthiopia for Chuſh.

† IV.

Another place of Ezekiel, c. 30. v. 9. in like manner miſtaken.

AND as the former, ſo is this place of Ezekiel miſtaken, by being in this ſort converted. In die illa egredientur nuncii à facie mea in trieribus ad conterendam Æthiopiæ confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in Engliſh by the Genevans: In that day ſhall there meſſengers go forth from me in ſhips to make the careleſs Moors afraid. Now the Latin for [Ships] hath the Greek word Trieres for Triremes which are Galleys of three Banks, and not Ships. But that in this place the Tranſlation ſhould have been (as in the former) amended by uſing the word Chuſh, or Arabia for Æthiopia or the Black-Moors, every Man may ſee which meanly underſtandeth the Geography of the World, knowing, that to paſs out of Ægypt into Æthiopia there need no Galleys nor Ships, no more than to paſs out of Northampton into Leiceſterſhire: Æthiopia being the conterminate Region with Ægypt, and not divided ſo much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Ezekiel it was meant, that from Ægypt Nabuchodonoſor ſhould ſend Galleys alongſt the Coaſt of the red Sea, by which an Army might be tranſported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (ſparing the long wearifom march over all Ægypt and the Deſarts of Pharan) which Army might thereby ſurpriſe them unawares in their ſecurity and confidence. For when Nabuchodonoſor was at Seveneh within a Mile of Æthiopia, he needed neither Galley nor Ship to paſs into it: being all one large and firm Land with Ægypt, and no otherwiſe parted from it, than one Inland Shire is parted from another; and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleaſure, he could not have done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and ſteepy Mountains) called Cataduþa Nili were at hand.

Laſtly, as I have already obſerved, the Sons of every Father ſeated themſelves as near together as poſſibly they could, Gomer and his Sons in Aſia the leſs; Javan and his Sons in Greece and the Iſlands adjoyning; Shem in Perſia and Eaſtward. So the Sons and Grand-children of Chuſh from the River of Gehon (their Fathers firſt Seat) inhabited upon the ſame, or upon ſome other contiguat unto it, as Nimrod and Havilah on the one ſide, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the reſt) did on the other ſide. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had never any Acquaintance or Fellowſhip, any War, Treaty of Peace, or other Intelligence with the Æthiopian Black Moors, as is already remembred in the Chapter of Paradiſe.

† V.

A place of Iſaiah 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chuſh for Æthiopia.

AND as in theſe places before-remembred, ſo in divers other is the word Æthiopia put for Arabia or Chuſh, which puts the Story (where it is ſo underſtood) quite out of ſquare; one Kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what ſenſe hath this part of Scripture, Iſaiah 18. Væ terræ Cymbalorum alarum quæ eſt trans fluvios Æthiopiæ, or according to the Septuagint in theſe words. Væ terræ navium alarum quæ eſt trans fluvios Æthiopiæ? Woe to the land ſhadowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia, ſending Ambaſſadors by ſea, even in veſſels of reeds upon the waters. Væ terræ umbroſæ oræ: Wo to the Land of the ſhady Coaſt, ſaith Junius. The former Tranſlators underſtand it in this ſenſe. That the Waters are ſhadowed with the Sails, which are ſignificatively called the Wings of the Ships; the other, that the Coaſt of the Sea was ſhadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpoſe: That this Land here ſpoken of by the Prophet Iſaiah is Ægypt no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Ægyptians that ſent this meſſage to the Iſraelites which Iſaiah repeateth, and by the former Tranſlation every Man may ſee the tranſpoſition of Kingdoms: for here by Ægypt is tranſported unto the other ſide of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia ſet next unto Judæa, when it is the Land of Chuſh and Arabia indeed that lieth between Judæa and Ægypt, and not Æthiopia, which is ſeated under the Æquinoctial Line. And of this Beroaldus asketh a material Queſtion (to wit) what Region that ſhould be, of which the Prophet ſpeaketh, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia: Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be ſaid that he treateth of an unknown Region. Now if Æthiopia it ſelf be under the Æquinoctial Line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why ſhould any Man dream that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it again, and beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? except we ſhall impiouſly think that the Prophet ſpake he knew not what, or uſed an impertinent Diſcourſe of thoſe Nations, which were not diſcovered in 2000 Years after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly known by the name of Bona Eſperanza.

† VI.

That upon the like miſtaking, both Terrhaka in the Story of Senacherib, and Zera in the Story of Aſa are unadviſedly made Æthiopians.

AND by this Tranſlation is the Story of Senacherib utterly miſtaken in the cauſe of his retreat. For Senacherib was firſt repulſed at Peluſium, at the very entrance of Ægypt from Judæa: when having certain knowledge that Thirrhaca, (which all the Interpreters call King of Æthiopia) was on the way to ſet on him, he began to withdraw himſelf: and fearing to leave his Army in two parts, he ſent threatning Meſſengers to Ezekiah King of Juda perſwading him to ſubmit himſelf: the tenor whereof is ſet down in the ſecond of Kings in theſe words: Have any of the Gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hands of the King of Aſſur? Where is the God of Hamah? &c. by which proud Ambaſſage, if he had obtained entrance into Jeruſalem, he then meant to have united that great Army before Jeruſalem commanded by Rabſakeh with the other which lay before Peluſium, a great City upon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already maſtered the moſt part of all thoſe Cities in Judæa and Benjamin with a third Army, (which himſelf commanded) being then at the Siege of Lebna. But upon the rumour of that Arabian Army led by their King Thirrhakeh (whom Josephus calls Tharsices) Rabsakeh hasted from the Siege of Jerusalem and found Senacherib departed from Lachis, and set down before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleutheropolis, as some have supposed. But while he had ill success at Pelusium and feared Thirrhakeh, God himself, whom he least feared, strook his Army before Jerusalem by the Angel of his Power, so as 185000 were found dead in the place; as in the Life of Ezekias is hereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Tirrakeh was from Arabia, Josephus himself makes it plain. For he confesseth in the tenth Book the first Chapter of the Jews Antiquities, that it was come to Senacherib's knowledge, that the Army which was a Foot (both to relieve the Ægyptians and the Jews) marched towards him by the way of the Desart: Now the Desart which lay indifferent between Jerusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sur, which also toucheth on the three Arabia's, to wit, the Stony, of which it is a part, the Desart, and the Happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Jerusalem. But, that there is any Desart between Pelusium and the South part of Ægypt, hath never yet been heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this Scripture of the second of Kings, Verse the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word [Chush] is also translated Æthiopia; and in this sense have all the Interpreters (but Junius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse. He heard also men say of Thirrhakeh King of Æthiopia, &c. whereas it should have been thus converted with Junius. Audiens autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chushi: He heard also of Thirrhakeh King of the Chusites. For they were the Chusites and Arabians, whose Houses and Cities were next the Fire, and upon whom the very Smoke of Juda flaming was blown, being their neerest Neighbours: and so were not the Æthiopian Black-Moors under the Æquinoctial, whom neither War nor Peace (which discovereth all Regions) ever found out, saith Pliny. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia than Zerah was, who invaded Asa King of Juda, with an Army of a Million and three thousand Chariots. Indeed, how such an Army and those Chariots should pass through all Ægypt, (the Kings of Ægypt being mighty Kings) let all Men that know now these Regions are seated, and how far distant, judge. For Princes do not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there ever any such strength of Black-Moors heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Æthiopians such Travellers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah also called King of Æthiopia. But the word Chush being first so converted for Æthiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the Seats of Kingdoms, or the possibilities of Attempts, or Invasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

Joſephus

A farther Exposition of the place, Isai. 18. 1.

CONcerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Isaiah, Navium alarum, winged ships, (so the Septuagint turn it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latin) Sails whistling in the Winds, or terræ umbrosæ oræ (after Junius) the Land of a shadowed Coast, or the Land shadowing with Wings, as our English Geneva hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome have one sense in effect. For the Sails are commonly called the Wings of a Ship; and we use to say ordinarily when our Ships sail slowly, that she wanteth Wings: (that is) when her Sails are either worn or too narrow, and we also use the same Phrase of the wind whistling in the Sails. And it may be that the Ægyptians employed so many of those small Ships, as their Sails were said to give a Shadow over the red Sea. But to make both Interpretations good, Pintus (upon Isaiah) affirmeth, that the word [Sabal] doth signifie both to Shadow and to Gingle (which is) to make a kind of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this: Wo to thee, O Ægypt, which dost promise to others safegard, under the shadow of thy Wings, which (indeed) seemeth to agree with the Argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Isaiah: and this Phrase is often elsewhere used, as in the sixteenth Psalm, Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me: Defend me under the shadow of thy wings. The Boats of Reed spoken of are of two kinds; either of Basket-Willow covered with Hides (as anciently in Britain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottom, and built upon both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I have seen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Ægypt.

†. I.

That Mizraim the chief Planter of Ægypt, and the rest of the Sons of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

THE second Son of Ham was Mizraim, who (according to the place of a second Brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chush first possest Chaldæa on the West-side of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as he increased in People, so he entred Arabia, and by time came to the Border of the red Sea, and to the South-east-side of Judæa. Mizraim his Brother (with Phut) past over into Africa. Mizraim held Ægypt: and Phut (as a third Brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan took the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palæstina: and these four Brothers possest all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldæa, as far to the West as the Mediterran Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petræa, all Canaan which embraceth Galilæa, Samaria, and Judæa; with the two Ægypts; whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterran Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the upper Ægypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as far as Syene, the Borden of the Æthiopians or Black-Moors. All the rest of the Coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which Brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their Sons again, and all the Sons of the rest of Noah's Children, sort themselves.

†. II.

†. II.

Of the time about which the name of Ægypt began to be known: and of the Ægyptians Lunary Years, which made their Antiquities seem the more fabulous.

THIS flourishing Kingdom possest by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Ægypt, at such time as Ægyptus (otherwise Rameses, as some think) the Son of Belus chased thence his elder Brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danai abandoning their proper names: which happened 877 Years after the Flood, in the time of Joshua, as S. Augustine conjectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homer's Odysses it appeareth that the Ægyptians were so called at the time of the Trojan War. And before this, Ægypt was known by divers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Josephus citeth in his first Book against Appion) numbreth all the Kings of Ægypt after Moses's departure, who consumed 393 Years. By which other Men conjecture, that the Ægyptians took on them that name 330 Years after Joshua, and about 1000 Years after the Flood. But where Josephus in the same Book taketh Israel to be those Hycsos, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Ægypt 511 Years: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Jews) in this I am sure he was grosly deceived, or that he vainly boasted; for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon feigneth: nor abode in Ægypt so long a time by many Years.

Of the Ægyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirm (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Ægypt 330 Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had Memory and Story of 13000 Years; and that the Stars had four times changed their course, and the Sun twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rife among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirm that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the Moon, whereof Ovid:

De Fast. l. 1.

Ante Jovem genitum terras habuisse feruntur
Arcades: & Lunâ gens prior illa fuit.

The Arcadians the Earth inhabited
Ere yet the Moon did shine, or Jove was bred.

But for those 13000 Years it may well be true: seeing it is certain that the Ægyptians reckon their Years by Months, which makes after that account not above 1060 or 1100 Years, whether we take their Months or Lunary Years to have been of the first kind of 27 days and eight horus; or otherwise 29 days and twelve hours; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunary Years.

†. III.

Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Ægyptians.

GErardus Mercator in his Chronology, reasoneth for the Ægyptians Antiquity in this manner; That the sixteenth Dinastie (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Ægyptians times) had beginning with the general Flood: and that therefore the first of the other fifteen reached the Creation, or soon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer: That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie was at once with the general Flood: which Eusebius maketh 292 Years after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the Shepherds Dynastia (being in number the 17.) in the time of their first King, Saltis, to have been in the Year of the World 1846, which Eusebius findeth in the Worlds Age 2140. For the 16 Dynastia was begun but in the 292 Year after the Flood, as they account, and continued 190 Years. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynastia to endure 115 Years, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at less than 100 Years: for the 28 had but 6 Years; the 29 but 20, and the 30 but 18 Years.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15 Dynasties lasted but 162 Years: and that the first of the 15 began but in the 131 Year after the Flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15 to precede the Flood, and the 16 to have been then in being at the time of the Flood, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falshood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former opinion and assertion, that it was in the 131 Year that Nimrod with the Sons of Noah came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off Plantation at all. And though he hastily conveyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the 10 Year of Nimrod's Reign: (which was ten Years after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Ægypt possest, and a Government established in the very first Year of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition far off or near in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

†. IV.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Ægypt was peopled within 200 Years after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Ægyptians, touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this Opinion of Pererius; (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Ægypt should be peopled within 100 or 200 Years after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the general Flood, I do verily believe the contrary: and that not only of Ægypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodò enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeò multiplicari potuit, ut ad Ægyptum usque habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the Children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred Years of the World, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Ægypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confess, that there there were then both the Assyrians, and other Nations.

Now seeing the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving Belief, it is lawful for every Man to be guided in this and the like Questions by the best Reason, Circumstance, and Likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I do not gainsay any Man's Opinion out of any crossing or cavelling Humour: for I think it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of Union, than out of froward Subtilty, and prejudicate Resolvedness, to maintain Factions needless, and dangerous Contentions.

First, therefore to this Opinion, that Ægypt was not planted so soon after Adam, no, not at all before the Flood, I say that there is no Reason why we should give a less Increase to the Sons of Adam, than to the Sons of Noah. For their length of Life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double, and (after a few Years) treble, is an infallible proof of their Strength and Ability, to beget many Children: and at that time they observed no degrees of Kindred, nor Consanguinity. And that there was a speedy Increase of People, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appear by this, that Cain, who (being fearful that the Death of Abel would have been revenged on him) withdrew himself from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there by the help of his own Issues built a City, (called Enoch) after the Name of his first-born. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this Increase there was given but 130 Years by Berosus, and after the Account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phaleg) but one hundred and one Year: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the Infancy of the first Age, when the Bodies of Men were most perfect, even within 130 Years, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased: and so within 70 Years after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200 Years) as well Assyria, Syria, and Ægypt might be possest before the Flood, as they were within the same or less time after it. Neither doth it agree with the Circumstance, or true Story of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those People, which were increased in the first hundred or 130 Years after the Flood, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that ever Noah himself came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it, so all probable Conjecture and Reason it self denies it. Again, those multitudes and powerful numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her own Army of three Millions, (and she left not all her Kingdoms empty) do well prove, that if the World had such plenty of People in so few Years after the Flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their own Account Ninus governed Babylonia and Assyria but 292 Years after the Flood of Noah. And these Troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Eastern Kingdoms, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her Invasion, somewhat less or more than 360 Years: for much more time the true Chronology cannot allow; though I confess, that in respect of the strange Greatness of Semiramis's Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be given. And if but the one half be true of that which is said, That her Army consisted of 1300000 Footmen, and 500000 Horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis's Reign, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Army was gathered) was full of People: yea Arabia it self (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis have been plentifully peopled; when Ninus having a determination to make himself Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in League wth the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his Assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Ægypt might also be peopled. Now if we may believe Trogus Pompeius (epitomiz'd by Justine) Ægypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was born. For these be his own words, speaking of Ninus. Fuere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Ægypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Ægypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Ægypt. And how full of People all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small Force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole Body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbreth the Army, wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000 Footmen, and 200000 Horsemen: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroaster's Army was far short of this, yet it was greater than any that those parts of the World ever since beheld. But to what end should I seek for Foreign Authority? for no Man doubteth but that Ægypt was possest by Mizraim, the Son of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdom, filled with many Cities in Abraham's time, the Scriptures tell us. And sure to prepare and cultivate a desolate and overgrown Ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Laws, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a Labour of a few Days: and therefore it must be inhabited in a less time than 200 Years after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many Millions of Men were found within 300 Years after the general Flood; so as not only Babylon, and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Ægypt, Palastina, yea the far-off Libya on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small Corners could then all those Nations be compress, which 1656 Years brought forth before the Flood? even Necessity, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of Mens bodies into all parts of the known World; especially, where Death forbare the Father, and made no place for the Son, till he had beheld living Nations of his own Body. Just. l. 1.

§. V.

Of some other Reasons against the Opinion of Pererius.

FOR what a strange Increase did the long Lives of the first Age make, when they continued 800 or 900 Years. Surely, we have reason to doubt, that the World could not contain them, rather than that they were not spread over the World. For let us now reckon the Date of our Lives in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceed 50 Years, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we find no want of People; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by Wars or Pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the Earth with all the Industry of Man could not give them Food. What strange heaps then of Souls had the first Ages, who enjoyed 800 or 900 Years as aforesaid! These numbers, I say, cannot be counted or conceived. For it would come to the ſame Reckoning in effect, as if all thoſe which have been born in Britain ſince 3 or 4 hundred Years before the Norman Conqueſt (ſaving ſuch as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to theſe there were added as many as by Polygamy might have been increaſed. For (to omit, that the Giants and mighty ones of the firſt Age obſerved no Law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that thoſe Lovers of the World and of Pleaſure, when they knew the long and liberal time which Nature had given them, would not willingly or haſtily preſent themſelves to any danger which they could flie from or eſchew. For what humane Argument hath better perſwaſion to make Men careleſs of Life, and fearleſs of Death, than the little time whch keeps them aſunder, and that ſhort time alſo accompanied with ſo many pains and diſeaſes, which this envious old Age of the World mingleth together, and ſoweth with the Seeds of Mankind.

Now if that Beroſus or Annius may be alledged for ſufficient Authors, whom Pererius himſelf in this Queſtion citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Joſephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was ſeated near Libanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cain's time, I ſee no cauſe why Paleſtina (which is alſo a Province of Syria) and Ægypt (which neighboureth it) could be left deſolate both all the life time of Cain, and all thoſe times between his Death and the Flood, which were by eſtimation 700 or 800 Years. And ſure though this Fragment of Beroſus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or loſt) yet all things in Beroſus are not to be rejected. Therefore Saint Hierome for ſuch Authors gives a good Rule. Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let us chuſe what is good in them, and reject the reſt. And certainly in the very beginning of the firſt Book, Beroſus agreeth (in effect) with Moſes, touching the general Flood: and in that firſt part Beroſus affirmeth, that thoſe mighty Men and Giants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all Nations, and ſubjected the Univerſal World: and though that phraſe [of all the World] be often uſed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the ſecond of the Acts. That there were dwelling at Jeruſalem Jews, men that feared God of every Nation under Heaven: yet by words which follow in Beroſus, it is plain that his words and ſenſe were the ſame: for he addeth from the Sun's riſing to the Sun's ſetting, which cannot be taken for any ſmall part thereof. Again, we may ſafely conjecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his Sons at adventure, or left them as Diſcoverers, but directed them to thoſe Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the Earth was more paſſable and eaſie to travel over before the Flood, than after it. For Pererius himſelf confeſſeth that Attica (by reaſon of Mud and Slime which the Water left upon the Earth) was uninhabited 200 Years after Ogyges Flood, whereby we may gather that there was no great pleaſure in paſſing into far Countries after the general Deluge, when the Earth lay (as it were) incopſed for 100 or 130 Years together. And therefore was the Face thereof in all conjecture more beautiful, and leſs cumberſome to walk over in the firſt Age, than after the general Overflowing.

†. VI.

Of the words of Moſes, Gen. 10. verſ. ult. wherepon Pererius grounded his Opinion.

LAſtly, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the laſt Verſe of the tenth of Geneſis. And out of theſe were the Nations divided after the Flood: Quo ſignificatur talem diviſionem non fuiſſe ante diluvium: By which it appeareth (ſaith Pererius) that there was no ſuch Diviſion before the Flood; which he alſo ſeeketh to confirm out of the eleventh of Geneſis, becauſe the diviſion of Tongues was cauſe of the Diſperſion of the People. This conſequence, quo ſignificatur, &c. ſeemeth to me very weak: the Text it ſelf rather teaching the contrary: for out of theſe (ſaith Moſes) were the Nations divided in the earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of theſe only. But whatſoever Senſe may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the Flood, or to any Plantation or Diviſion in that Age: for if there were none elſe among whom the Earth could be divided after the Flood, but Noah's Sons, wherein doth that neceſſary diviſion controle the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alledged that the confuſion of Speech was the cauſe of this diſperſion, it is true, that it was ſo for that preſent; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confuſion of Languages at all, yet increaſe of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and general Plantation: as Beroſus ſays well, that when Mankind were exceedingly multiplied, ad comparandas novas ſedes neceſſitas compellebat, They were driven by Neceſſity to ſeek new Habitations. For we find (as is before ſaid) that within 300 Years after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, ſuch multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not have ſuſtained thoſe numbers with their increaſe for any long time: all Aſia the greater and the leſſer; all Scythia, Arabia, Paleſtina, and Ægypt, with Greece, and the Iſlands thereof; Mauritania and Libya being alſo at that time fully peopled. And if we believe Beroſus, then not only thoſe parts of the World, but (within 140. Years after the Flood) Spain, Italy, and France were alſo planted: much more then may we think, that within 1656 Years before the Flood, in the time of the chief ſtrength of Mankind, they were repleniſhed with People. And certainly ſeeing all the World was overflown, there were People in all the World which offended.

†. VII.

A Concluſion, reſolving of that which is moſt likely, touching the Ægyptian Antiquities: with ſomewhat of Phut, (another Son of Ham) which peopled Libya.

THerefore for the Antiquity of the Ægyptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, nor judge with the Vulgar, which give too much Credit to the Ægyptians Antiquities: ſo I do not think the report of their Antiquities ſo fabulous, as either Pererius or other Men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, That Ægypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200 or 300 Years, more or leſs after Adam, there might remain unto the Sons of Mizraim ſome Monuments (in Pillars or Altars of Stone or Mettal) of their former Kings or Governours: which the Ægyptians having added to the Liſt and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in ſucceeding ceeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inferred. And that the memory of antiquity was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. for they both write, that the use of Letters and the Art of Astronomy was known to the Babylonians 3634. Years before Alexander's Conquest: and this report Annius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enosh, who was born 1034. Years before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds Destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his coming in judgement; as St. Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens judgments, and every Man to his own Reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Ægypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Ægypt from Ægyptus the Son of Belus, as aforesaid. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterran Sea, was called the inferiour Ægypt; surnamed also Delta: because the several branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the form of the Greek letter Delta, which is the form of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-East and embraced the Sea, next unto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the City of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yielded it self to the salt water towards the North-West, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The upper part of Ægypt is bounded between Memphis and Syene near Æthiopa, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient City of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks Diospolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding belief. Josephus calls Ægypt Mersin of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had once the name of Thebais.

Joseph l. 1. Ant. cap. 7. Herod. Euterpe.

Phut the third Son of Ham took the next portion of land to his Brother Mizraim, and inhabited Libya: whose People were anciently called Phutei; (saith Josephus) and Pliny mentioneth the River Fut in Mauritania: which River from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred Miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezekiel, that Phut, Chush and Lud were contermini and Associates with the Ægyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleven Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

†. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven Sons.

Canaan (the fourth Son of Ham) possest all that Region called by the Romans Palestina; in the Scriptures Galilæa, Samaria, and Judæa; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Jurie: the limits whereof are precisely set down by Moses, Genesis the tenth. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar unto Azzah, and as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrha, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Lesha. Now howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text [as thou goest] be converted, Moses's meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodom and Gomorrha the East, and the other Cities named stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right line from Gaza, in the way of Ægypt, the uttermost Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the Sons of Canaan which possest this Country, and inhabited some part of the Borders thereof, were in number eleven:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Jebusi or Jebusæus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amorei.
5. Girgeshi or Girgesæus.
6. Hevi or Chivæus.
7. Arki or Harkeus.
8. Seni or Sinæus.
9. Araadi or Arvadæus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi or Hamatheus, or Chamathæus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergesites, Amorites, Hevites, Jebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari or Samareus, or from some of his.

†. II.

Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first born of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asher: for Asher, Zabulon, and Nephtali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia distributed among them; but the Asherites could never obtain Zidon it self.

The second Son of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seven principal Nations (commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out: namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and Hevites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron near the Torrent Besor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, having the Desart of Pharan, to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus juramenti) four Miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the North-East as Hebron, and Mamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the Field of Sarah's Burial. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her self to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her Life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the second of the Kings; Israel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites.

†. III.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

Jebusæus, the third Son of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principal seat was Jebus, (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their City and the Country near it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amoreus was the fourth Son of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the Mountains of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (overthrown by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus in the edge of Cœlesyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountains of Juda, and in Idumæa near the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth, for the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerful Nation, we find in the Prophet Amos; Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose heighth was like the heighth of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oaks.

†. IV.

Of the Gergesites, Hevites and Harkites.

THE fifth Son of Canaan was Gergeseus or Gergesion, (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolomy sets the City Gerasa, which Josephus calls Gesera in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossest the possessed with Devils; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts: because their Swine filled with the evil Spirits drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergeseus also built Berytus (sometime Geris) afterward Fœlix Julia, three Miles from the River Adonis in Phœnicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gave many large Priviledges.

Heveus the sixth Son; and Father of the Hevites, inhabited under Libanus near Emath. These Hevites, howsoever the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomy the second is remembred) yet many of them remained all the War of Joshua, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times served (in their falling away from the true Worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written Judges the third; They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandments of God.

The seventh Son was Araceus or Harki, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (over against Tripolis) built the City of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

†. V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

SIneus the eighth Son Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparorsa, which Ptolomy finds in Judæa not far from Jebus; to the South thereof, saith Junius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which St. Hierome calls Sim; Ptolomy Simyra: Mela and Pliny Simyrus: Brochard Sycon, (called Synochis) near Arca. Pererius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Desarts of Sinai or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming that Sineus built Synochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C. otherwise Kenai) who descended of Hobab the Son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites, in their conduction through the Wilderness of Pharan. But these Cinei were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephtalims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinei Balaam prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

Judg. 4. Josua 19. 33.

The ninth Son was Aradeus or Arvadeus, who in the Isle of Aradus built the City Arados: opposite against which Island on the main of Phœnicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came S. Peter (saith Clement) and in this Isle preached the Gospel: and founded a Church in Honour of our Lady: but we find no such work of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous: and places of skilful Seamen: whom Ezekiel remembereth in his prophecies against the Tyrians. The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy Mariners.

Gul. Tyr. Vitria. c. 7. v. 8.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

OF Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth Son, there are divers opinions. Some think that he first inhabited in Cœlesyria at Edessa, and founded Samaraim, which in Josbua is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is also Samaraim (of the same Orthography) upon the Mountains of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chronicles c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine converteth amiss (saith he) by Semeron. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emissani, which Pliny calls the Hemiseni, in Cœlesyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembred. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthography, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproveth. And he bought the Mountain Samaria of Shemeron of one Shemer for two Talents of silver, and built in the Mountain: and called the name of the City which he built, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountain Samaria. But of all these places I shall speak more at large in the Conquest of the Holy Land, by the Children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritans were descended, sure I am, that they were ever a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the State of the Jews stood up, they always called themselves Jews: when it suffered or sunk, they then utterly denyed to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first Captivity, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians; and partly of the naturals.

Of Hamathi.

THE last of Canaan's Sons was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath: (saith Beroaldus) of which (the aspiration taken taken away) the ſame is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamathæus was Parent. Joſephus and St. Hierome confound Emath with Antioch, not that Antioch which ſtandeth on the River Orontes on the Frontier of Comagena, betweeen the Mountain Caſſius and the Province of Pieria, and Seleucis, of which S. Peter was Biſhop, and in which S. Luke and Ignatius were born: but Antioch, ſurnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus ſuppoſeth, which ſtandeth between Apamea and Emeſa in Caſſiotis. Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emeſa, are farther off ſeated from Canaan, than ever any of thoſe Nations ſtragled. And whereas S. Hierome ſetteth Emath, which he confounded with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephtali; it is manifeſt that Epiphania, which ſtandeth to the North of Emeſa hath all the Province of Laodicea between it and any part of the Land divided. And if Libanon it ſelf were not ſhared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces Laodicea and Libanica, are between Epiphania and any part of the Holy Land, and therefore Emath ſo taken could not be a part of Nephtali, as in the thirteenth of Joſhua is directly proved. For Joſhua, counting the lands that remained unpoſſeſt, reckoneth all mount Libanon towards the Sun-riſing, from Baalgad under Mount Hermon, until we come to Hamath. And this reaſon (among others) is

2. Sam. 8. 9. uſed, that Emath was not in Nephtalim, or any way belonging to the Children of Iſrael: becauſe David accepted the Preſents of Toha King of Emath, and (therewithal) conditions of Peace: which he would not have done, if that Territory had ever belonged to the Children of Iſrael, but would have recovered it without compoſition, and by ſtrong hand, as he did the reſt. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promiſe which God
Deut. 11. 24. made be conſidered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, though ſeated altogether without the Bounds of the Land promiſed, according to the deſcription of Moſes and Joſhua: for Emath is indeed ſituate on the other ſide of the Mountain of Hermon, which joineth to Libanus: and is otherwiſe called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Joſhua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine converſion Emath, therein (ſaith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome miſtaken. Emath or Iturea is that over the Mountains, and the City in Nephtalim ſhould be written Hamath: and ſo the Septuagint (underſtanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the ſame which indeed belonged to the Nephtalims, ſeated on the South-ſide of Libanus to the Eaſt of Aſſedim: which City S. Hierome writes Emath, Joſephus Hamath, others Emathin, or Amatheos, and the People Amathein; of which (as I take it) Rabſakeh vaunteth

Of the Sons of Chuſh (excepting Nimrod) of whom hereafter.

The Sons of Chuſh were { Seba, Havila, Sabta, Raama, Sabteca, Nimrod. } And the Sons of Raama were, { Sheba, and Dedan. }

§. I.

That the moſt of the Sons of Chuſh were ſeated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabæans that robbed Job: and of the Queen that came to Salomon.

Seba or Saba was the eldeſt Son of Chuſh, the eldeſt Son of Ham, to make a difference betweene him and his Nephew Sheba, the Son of his Brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma, after Montanus) his name is written with a ſingle [S] Samech, and Sheba the Son of Regma with an [S] aſpirate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldeſt Son of Chuſh, Regma his Brother, and Sheba the Son of Regma poſſeſt both the Shores of Arabia Fœlix. Saba took that part toward the Red Sea, as neareſt his Father Chuſh, and the Land of the Chuſites: Regma, and Sheba, the Eaſt Coaſt of the ſame Arabia which looketh into the Gulf of Perſia; of which Pliny, Sabæi Arabum populi propter thura clariſſimi ad utraq; maria porrectis gentibus habitant: The Sabæans people, of Arabia, famous for their Frankincenſe, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas (to wit) the Perſian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Country was afterwards called Arabia à populi mixtione, ſaith Poſtellus. To this agreeth Ptolomy, who ſetteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the City Rhegama towards the Perſian, with whom alſo we may leave Sabta: for ſo much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolomy, becauſe he remembreth a Nation (called Stabei) near the Perſian Sea; and Maſſabathæ which deſcended of them. But Montanus hath ſent Regma, or (as he calls him Rahma) into Carmania, for which I ſee no reaſon. Joſephus, who only attended his own fancies, hath baniſhed Saba or Seba to the border of Æthiopia. But Beroaldus thinks it ſtrange, that the Sabæi, which ſtole away Job's Cattle, ſhould run through all Ægypt and all Arabia Petræa, and find out Job in Traconitis betweeñ Paleſtina and Cœleſyria 1200. Miles off. Now as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, ſo do I think, that neither the Sabæi on the Red Sea, nor thoſe toward the Perſian Sea, could by any means execute the ſtealth upon Job, which ſoever Beroaldus ſhall take for neareſt. But theſe were the Sabæi of Arabia the Deſart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his own experience, that the City Saba is ſeated: the ſame which Ptolomy calls Save, now Semiſcaſac: and from this Saba in Arabia the Deſart, came thoſe Magi or Wiſemen which worſhipped Chriſt, ſaith Melchior, whoſe words are theſe: The Magi came neither out of Meſopotamia (as Chryſoſtome, Hierome, and Ambroſe ſuppoſed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wiſe Men do believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the Deſart: which City when my ſelf was there, was (as I judged it) called Semiſcaſac. And to approve this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that thee Sabæi were Neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well thoſe on the Perſian Sea, as thoſe on the Red Sea) are ſo disjoyned with large Deſarts, as there is no poſſibility for Strangers to paſs them, eſpecially with any numbers of Cattle, both in reſpect of the Mountains, of the Sands, and of the extream want of Water in thoſe parts. Ubi nec homines nec beſtiæ videntur, nec aves, imò nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, ſed non niſi montes ſaxoſi, altiſſimi, & ſperrimi: Where there are found neither Men nor Beaſt, no not ſo much as Birds, or Trees, nor any Paſture, or Graſs, but only ſharp, and high ſtony, and craggy Mountains. Beroaldus and

Pererius

Pererius conceive that the Queen of Saba which came to visit Solomon, was of the Sabæi on the East side of Arabia Fœlix; but the contrary seemeth more probable, and that she was Queen of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petræa, 'twixt Idumæa and the Red Sea, as far down as Midian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber: and this Queen of Saba which inhabited the West Part of Arabia Fœlix, being his Neighbour, might without any far Travel enter his Territories, free from all danger of Surprize by any other Prince or Nation.

But to avoid tediousness, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Rhegma, with his Sons Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the possessors of Arabia the Happy and the Desart: only Havilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side of Chush, who held Arabia Petræa. Now for Sabta, there is found of his Name the City of Sabbatha or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both Pliny and Ptolomy; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the Walls whereof there were sometimes found sixty Temples. Ezekiel joineth the Father and the Son together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants: And that they were the Eastern Arabians their Merchandize witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Josephus his Fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Æthiopians about Meroe, and Sabta of the Æthiopians Astabari, they be not worthy any farther Answer than hath already been given: especially seeing these Cities preserving the memory of the Names of Saba and Sabta in Arabia were yet remaining in Ptolomy's time, though in some Letters changed. As also in the Coasts adjoining, the Names of other of the Brethren of the Family of Cush, with little Alterations are preserved. In Arabia the Desart is found the City Saba or Save, (now Semiscasac) with the City of Rhegana for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolomy himself called Raabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Happy is found the City of Rhegama, and Rabana, which also keepeth the found of Rhegma, the City of Saptha or Saptah, not far from the East Coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chief City, in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha; and to the West of Sabatha towards the Red Sea the great City of Saba; and the Nation adjoining, Sabæi: and to the South thereof again toward the straight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all these his Brothers and Nephews which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Havilah by the passage of Tigris was a Neighbour, to whom he might pass by Boat even unto Rhegma the City of Raama or Rhegma, set near the River of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Ptolomy's time.

†. II.

Josephus his Opinion of Dedan, one of the Issue of Chush, to have been seated in West Æthiopia, disproved out of Ezekiel and Jeremy.

AND whereas Josephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the Son of Raamah into West Æthiopia, it is strange that Ezekiel should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15 Verse, and Sheba and Raamah in the 22 Verses to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Æthiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the Habitation of his Father and Brother) above 4000 Miles. Besides which the Merchandize that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Black-moors. For they of Dedan (saith Ezekiel) were thy Merchants in precious Cloths for thy Chariots; and these Western Æthiopians never saw Cloth, till the Portugals seeking those Coasts traded with them: the Merchandize of the Country being Hides, Elephants Teeth, some Gold and Amber, Civet Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any Manufacture: and all these they exchanged for Linnen, or Iron chiefly.

But in those days the West part of Africa within the Body of the Land was known only by Imagination: and, being under the burnt Zone was held uninhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the West Æthiopia, which inhabit about Serra, Liona, or Niger, could either pass by Sea or Land to Tyre in the bottom of the Mediterran Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish Fancy. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the Children of Chush, which Seats they held by that Name in the time of Jeremy the Prophet, let us hear Jeremy his own words. Fly ye Inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the destruction of Esau upon him. Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumæans: and Idumæa is a Province of Arabia Petræa: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Fœlix, joined in that part to Petræa, the Seat of his Grand-father Chush; which Neighbourhood and Fellowship of Dedan and the Idumæans is also confirmed by Ezekiel. I will stretch out mine hand upon Edom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the Sword.

Ezek. 25. 13.

§. XIV.

Of the Issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Jeremy, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

AFter Chush it followeth to speak of Mizraim's Sons, whose Names (saith Saint Augustine) were plural, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim the eldest Son of Mizraim was the Father of the Libyans in Africa: and the rest of his Brothers dispersed themselves into all Regions adjoining. Among the Sons of Shem there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the Son of Mizraim by the singular number: the Son of Shem being written Lud, the Son of Mizraim Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For that Ludim the Son of Mizraim was Parent of the Libyans in Africa, and that he was seated not far from Mizraim his Father, appeareth by the Prophet Jeremy, who joineth them in this sort together. Come up ye Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant Men come forth, the Black-moors and the Libyans which bear the Shield: for those Nations assisted the Ægyptians being of one Parent descended. And in Ezekiel, Phut and Lud are joined together. Æthiopia (or Chush) saith Ezekiel c. 30. v. 3. And Phut and Lud, and all the common People, and the Men of the Land that are in League shall fall with them by the Sword: which is as much to say, as the Sons of Chush; (which were the Chusites) the Sons of Mizraim, (which were the Ægyptians) and the Libyans, (descended of his Son Lud) with other the Inhabitants of Ægypt and Africa shall fall together. Hierosolymitanus finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lidyans. And I believe it: because Jeremy joineth the Libyans and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Libya in Africa is by the Hebrew called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus)

The termination im in the Hebrew, is commonly a sign of the plural number, as aim of the dual.

tanus) though 2 Chron. 12. 3. they seem to be called Lubim or Lubes, a name somewhat nearer the word Libyes, and by which it may seem that the truer writing is, not Libyes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (upon the thirtieth of Ezekiel) understandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Libyans at all: for he will have this threatning to be meant against the People of Lyda, a City (saith he) between Ægypt and Palæstina, which opinion I could not mislike if the City of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same City which was afterward Diospolis, in which S. Peter cured Æneas of the Palsey) standeth near the Torrent Gaas, not far from Joppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and far asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, so of divers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya who was the third Son of Mizraim: and so doth Postellus; and either opinion may be true.

The rest of Mizraim's Sons have no proper Countries given them in the Scriptures, saving Casluhim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleset.

These Casluhim inhabited Cassiotis, a Region lying in the entrance of Ægypt from Palæstina, in which the Lake Sirbonis and the Mountain Cassius are found: not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim seated near Casluhim in that Tract of Ægypt called Sethroitis, not far from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Sethroitis; Stephanus and Pliny Sethroites, of the City Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolomy calls Hercules parva. Of the Casluhim and Caphtorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyli (which is) Alienigenæ, Strangers, or of a strange Kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the Holy Land towards Ægypt, of whom Palæstina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) do not use the letter [P] but instead of it [Ph.] Their principal Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the People of them called Gazæi, Ascalonitæ, Azotii, Gethæi, and Accaronitæ. Isidore affirms that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that City the Country adjoining. But where Isidore had it I know not.

The first known King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's Wife; with whom Abraham made a Covenant and League. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that he was also King of the Philistims, in these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech governed the Commonwealth greatly to his glory, the rest of his Successours called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of Land upon the Mediterran Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Cæsarea Palæstina or Straton's Tower) which was the South border of Phœnicia, to Gaza or to the River of Ægypt. The Anakims or strong Giants were of these Philistims, and Goliah was of Geth one of the five Cities above named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Liranus. They mastered the Israelites at several times above 150 Years, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuel; but in the end this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

Basil upon the 33. Psalm. Hieron upon the 20. of Ezekiel.

It is objected, That because these Cities and the Countries adjoining were held by the Sons of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossess the Sons of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Palæstines or Philistims held it in the time of Joshua, yet at the time of the promise it was possest by the Canaanites; as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Hevites dwelt in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvel if (the Canaanites being the greater part) the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Hieremy witnesseth. The Lord will destroy the Philistims, the remnant of the Isle of Caphtor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the Reliques of Caphtorim; have not I brought up Israel out of the land of Ægypt, and the Philistims from Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? so I read this place with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, & Palæstinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conversion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly West from Ægypt, between Ptolemais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia under the Assyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneva. But Pererius calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palæstina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the less. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palæstina, it is not certainly known. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglatphalasser King of the Assyrians carried away the Inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Josephus seems to understand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene Media Superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Assyrians to transplant the People Conquered by them, as they did the Samarians or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captived.

Of the Issue of Sem.

†. I.

Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speak of the Sons of Sem, who were these:

1. Alam, or Elam.
2. Ashur.
3. Arphaxad.
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

THE Posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogy and Story of the Hebrews. For of Sem was Abraham descended.

Of these five sons the Scriptures remember the length of the Life of Arphaxad only, and only the Children of him and Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by by rehearſal of their Names, ſaving that it may be gathered, that Aſſur (who was ſuppoſed to found Niniveh) was alſo ſaid to be the Father of the Aſſyrians, whoſe Iſſues, and the Iſſues of Cham inſtantly contended for the Empire of the East: which ſometimes the Aſſyrians, ſometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the Vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which alſo teacheth us, that all the East-parts of the World were peopled by Aſſur, Elam, and Lud, (ſaving India) which I believe Noah himſelf firſt inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Havilah the Sons of Joctan afterward repaired. Hii filii Sem ab Euphrate fluvio partem Aſia uſque ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; Theſe Sons of Sem (ſaith S. Hierom) held all thoſe Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Joſeph. ant. l. 1. c. 7. Of Elam came the Elamites, remembred Acts the 2. v. the 9. and the Princes of Perſia; which Name then began to be out of uſe and loſt, when the Perſians became Maſters of Babylonia: the East Monarchy being eſtabliſhed in them. Some prophane Writers diſtinguiſh Elam from Perſia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Suſa (which the Scriptures call Suſan) in Elam was the c. 8. v. 2. Kings Seat of Perſia (witneſs Daniel.) And I ſaw (ſaith he) in a Viſion, and when I ſaw it I was in the Palace of Suſan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the River Eulæus Ptol. Aſiæ tab. 5. (according to Ptolomy) in Daniel, Ulai: and ſeated in the Border of Suſiana.

Dan. 8. 2. Aſhur (as moſt Hiſtorians believe) the ſecond Son of Sem, was Father of the Aſſyrians, who diſdaining the Pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal Beauty and Magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we ſhall in due place diſprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath been in this Story, and therefore I ſhall not need herein to ſpeak much: for the Aſſyrians ſo often invaded and ſpoiled the Iſraelites, deſtroyed their Cities, and led them Captives, as both in Divine and Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howſoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with ample Dominion; yet was not the State of the Aſſyrians of any ſuch Power, after ſuch time as Sardanapalus loſt the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfulleſt Princes among them, had yet the Mountain Taurus for the utmoſt of his Dominion toward the North-eaſt, and Syria bounded him toward the Weſt, notwithſtanding thoſe Vaunts V. 11. of Senacherib in Eſay the 37. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have deſtroyed? as Gozan, and Haran, and Reſeph, and the Children of Eden which were at Telaſſar. Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the City Sepharvaim, Henah and Ivah? All theſe indeed were but Petty Kings of Cities, and ſmall Countries; as Haran in Meſopotamia: Reſeph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Iturea under Libanus: the Iſle of Eden: Sepher, and others of this ſort. Yea Nabuchodonoſor, who was moſt powerfull, before the Conqueſt of Ægypt had but Chaldæa, Meſopotamia, and Syria, with Paleſtina and Phœnicia parts thereof. But in this queſtion of Aſſur, I will ſpeak my Opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whoſe Plantation I have omitted among the reſt of the Chuſites, becauſe he eſtabliſhed the firſt Empire: from whom the moſt memorable ſtory of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldæans, ſaith S. Hierom, and Joſephus, but it muſt be thoſe Chaldæans about Ur: for the Sons of Cham poſſeſt the reſt. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrews: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud the fourth Son of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Aſia the leſs, is the common opinion, taken from Joſephus and S. Hierom; but I ſee not by what reaſon he was moved to ſtraggle thither from his Friends.

†. II.

Of Aram and his Sons.

Aram the fifth and laſt Son of Shem was the Parent of the Syrians: of which Damaſcus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (ſaith Euſebius out of Joſephus) which Syrus lived before Moſes was born; the ſame which others call the Son of Apollo. Meſopotamia alſo being but a Province of Syria had the name of Aram Naharaiim, which is as much to ſay, as Syria duorum fluviorum, Syria compaſſed with two Rivers: (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Meſopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram, and the Greeks Meſopotamia ſimply. Eſay. 7. v. 8. Euſeb. p. 10. 6.

Ariſe and get thee to Padan Aram (ſaith Iſaac to Jacob) to the houſe of Bethuel thy Mothers Father, and thence take thee a Wife. Strabo alſo remembreth it by the antient name of Aram or Aramea, as theſe his own words converted witneſs. Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipſi Syri Aramenios & Arameas vocant, Thoſe which we call Syrians (ſaith he) themſelves call Aramenians and Arameans. Gen. 28. 2. See Gen. 25. 20. alſo Deutr. 23. 4. Judg. 3. Paral. l. 19 Pſalm. 59. Strabo. l. 1.

Againſt this opinion that Aram the Son of Sem, was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in general; (and not only of thoſe in Syria Inter-amnis, which is Meſopotamia) ſome read Gen. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the Original read Kemuel, the Son of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to underſtand the word [Aram] here, not for the Nation, but for the name of ſome one of note; the rather, becauſe in the Hiſtory of Abraham and Iſaac (which was in time long before Kemuel's Poſterity could be famous) we find Meſopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: ſometimes with Naharaiim, and ſometimes of Padan, to diſtinguiſh it from another Aram, which (as it ſeems) then alſo was called Aram. For whereas Junius thinks in his Note upon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be reſtrained to ſome part of Meſopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomy calls Ancobaritis (ſo called from the River Chaborus, which dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiſcuous uſe of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharaiim (which latter appellation queſtionleſs comprehends the whole Meſopotamia) may ſeem to refute this opinion: eſpecially ſeeing the ſignification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it ſignifieth as much as the Yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: becauſe the two Rivers (as it were) yoked together go along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appear in the name of two Cities in Ptolomy, called Aphadana (as Junius hath well noted) the one upon Chaborus, the other upon Euphrates.

The Sons of Aram were, { Uz or Hus, Hul, Gether, and Meſeh or Mes.

Uz or Hus inhabited about Damaſcus, and built that City, ſay Joſephus and S. Hierom. But Toſtatus miſliking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who alſo followeth Joſephus, affirmeth that Abraham's Steward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; Hieron. in trad. Hebraic.

of; though it were likely that Hus the eldest Son of Aram dwelt near unto his Father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adjoining to Arabia the Desart, and to Batanea or Traconitis: whereof the Prophet Jeremy. Rejoyce and be glad O daughter of Edom that dwellest in the land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Traconitis, adjoining to Basan, having Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountain Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: having in it many Cities and People, as may also be gathered out of Jeremy: And all sorts of people: and all the Kings of the land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Job, descended of Hus, the Son of Nahor, the Brother of Abraham (saith S. Jerome) and married Dinah the Daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

Jerem. Lament. c. 4. v. 21.

c. 25. v. 20.

Hul the second Son of Aram S. Jerome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third Son, Parent to the Arcananians or Carians: which opinion, (because I find not where to set him) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should leave the fellowship of his own Brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the less. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desart of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, were Ptolomy setteth the City of Challe.

Gether (saith Josephus) founded the Bactrians: but Josephus gave all Noah's Children Feathers, to carry them far away in all haste. For mine own opinion I always keep the rule of neighbourhood, and think with Junius: (to wit) That Gether seated himself near his Brothers, in the Body of Syria, and in the Province of Cassiotis, and Seleucis, where Ptolomy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Junius also giveth to Mes or Mesch the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, near the Mountain Masius. The certainty of those Plantations can no otherwise be known than by this probability, that Aram the Father (of whom that great Region took name) planted his Sons in the same Land about him: for he wanted no scope of Territory for himself and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred Years after; and therefore there is no reason to cast them into the Desart parts of the World, so far asunder. And as necessity and policy held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their Children set them asunder. For although these Sons of Aram, and the Sons of the rest of Noah's Children, kept themselves within the Bounds of some one large Kingdom; yet therein every one also sought a Province apart, and to themselves; giving to the Cities therein built their own Names, thereby to leave their memory to their Posterity: the use of Letters being then rare, and known to few.

In this sort did the Pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Provinces: every one emulating and disdaining the greatness of others, as they are thereby to this day subject to Invasion, Expulsion, and Destruction: so as (Nova Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are unaccessable to Strangers) an easie Force will cast them out of all the rest.

Mes the fourth Son is made the Parent of the Maonians; of whom something hath been spoken already. Arphaxad the third Son of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two Sons, Phaleg and Jektan: and in Phaleg's time was the Earth divided.

Chap. 8. §. 7.

§. III.

Of the division of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the Sons of Heber, of the Issue of Sem.

THE many People which at the division (at Phaleg's Birth) were then living, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his Death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were divided at either. The Hebrews (saith Pererius out of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirm that this partition happened at the Death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was born in the Year after the Flood 101. and lived in all 239 Years, which numbers added make 340. And therefore was it so many Years, after the Flood, ere the Children of Noah severed themselves. But to this opinion of the Hebrews, and the doubt they make how in so few Years as 101 (the time of Phaleg's Birth) so many People could be increased; Pererius gives this answer, that if 70 Persons of the Family of Jacob increased to 600000 fighting Men in 215 Years, (besides Women, Children, and impotent Persons) how much more is it likely, that so soon after the Flood the Children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, having received the Blessing of God: Increase and multiply, and fill the Earth? What strength this answer hath, let others judge: for the Children of Israel were 70. and had 215 Years time: and the Sons of Noah were but three, and had but 101 Years of time, to the Birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg took that name after the division, in memory thereof: as Josephus and S. Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the division were at Phaleg's Death (which happened in the Year, which is commonly held to be the 48 of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12 Years before his Birth (then was the division 38 Years after Ninus, who governed 52 Years: in the 43 Year of whose Reign Abraham was born. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians 80 Years before this division (as this division is placed by the Hebrews, Jerome and Chrysostom) then was the Earth so peopled in all the East and Northern parts, as greater numbers have not been found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himself Arbeus King of Arabia, a People who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atque armis præstabant, exceeded both in Riches and Bodies of Men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; received Barzanis into grace; then invaded Media, and Crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seven Children; vanquished all those Regions between Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phœnicians, the Kingdoms of Syria; and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembred out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with four hundred thousand, prove it sufficiently, that if the division had not happened before the Death of Phaleg, there had needed no division at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they sought to be Masters of all; and greater Armies were there never gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

Pererius in Gen. l. 1. c. 10.

But for that conceit that if the division had been made at the Birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers born to fill the Earth: It was never meant that the Earth could be filled every where at the instant, but by times and degrees:

And surely whatsoever mens opinions have been herein, yet it is certain, that the Division of Tongues and of Men must go near together with the ceasing of the work at Babel: and that the enterprise of Babel was left off instantly upon the confusion of Languages, where followed the Execution of the Division; and so neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was born in the year 101 after the Flood, which was the year that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or 10 years after he arrived, saith Berosus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymology of whose name signifieth Division) must have lived without a name, except the name had been given him at the time of this Confusion and Partition: To this objection it may be answered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angel; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom Esau; and that Phaleg being a principal man in this division had his first name upon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly whereas the Hebrews, S. Hierom and Chrysostom account Heber a great Prophet, if that by giving his Son the name of Phaleg, he foretold the Division which followed: To this I say, I do not find that Heber deserved any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his Son: for division and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Prophecy (if any such had been) might also have reference to the division, which afterwards fell among the Hebrews themselves.

But if we give a reasonable time to the building of the Tower and City of Babel, by which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proof) might be increased: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Phaleg took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

† IV.

Of the Sons of Joctan, the other Son of Heber.

The Sons of Joctan were:

1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Selep, or Sheleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Jare, or Jarah, or Jerah.
5. Hadoram.
6. Uzal, or Uxal.
7. Dicklach, or Dicla,
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba,
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Havila, or Chavila, and
13. Jobab.

ALL those Sons of Joctan (according to S. Hierom) dwelled in the East parts of the World, or India, even from the River Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of those thirteen Sons cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being general. And their dwelling was from Mesha as thou goest unto Sephar a mount in the East. Of all these thirteen Sons, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whose names to avoid confusion it is to be observed, that among the Sons of Chush, two of them had also the names of Seba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-child by his Wife Ketura. But Seba the Son of Chush, and Sheba the Son of Rhegma his Nephew, we have left in Arabia Felix: and Havilah the Son of Chush upon Tigris. Saba the Grand-child of Abraham was (as some have thought) the Father of the Sabaans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ maketh mention. Primum Sabæi; post hos sunt Passagardæ, prope vero hos sunt Tasci: The first are Sabæans: after these be Passagardæ; and near these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But unto the Sons of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his Son (while he yet lived) Eastward to the East Country: hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the Son of Abraham wandred into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthermost East Country in respect of Judæa; which also Ovid setteth under the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abraham's Sons seated themselves on the Borders of Judæa, I rather choose to leave Saba the Son of Abraham in Arabia the Desart, where Ptolomy setteth a City of that name.

Gen. 25. vi 6.

Metam. l. 1.

But Saba the Son of Joctan, the Son of Heber, (as I conceive) inhabited India it self. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which he wrote in Greek Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabæi. Taxilus hos inter medios habitatque Sabæus, In the midst of these dwell the Sabæi, and the Taxili, saith this Dionysius.

Τῶν δ' μέσοι ναίουσι Σαβαῖ καὶ Ταξίλοι ἀνδρες.

† V.

Of Ophir one of Joctan's Sons, and of Peru, and of that Voyage of Salomon.

OPhir also was Inhabitant of the East India, and as (S. Hierom understands it) in one of the Islands plentiful of Gold, which are now known by the name of Moluccæ. Josephus understands Ophir to be one of those great Head-lands in India, which by a general name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsula: of which there are two very notorious; Callecut, and Malacca. Pererius takes it rightly for an Island, as S. Hierom doth, but he sets it at the Head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther East.

Arias Montanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The words in the second of the Chronicles are these, And he overlayed the House with pretious Stones for Beauty; and the Gold was Gold of Parvaim. Junius takes this Gold to be the Gold of Havilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the Gold of that Land is good: finding a Town in Characene a Province of Susiana called Barbatia; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parvaim: from whence those Kings subjected by David, brought this Gold, with which they presented him; and which David preserved for the enriching of the Temple.

Gen. 2. 11. & 12. Plin. l. 6. c. 28.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Plessis, who also took Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be a subject of no farther dispute; it is very true, that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am that at least America hath none, no not any City, Village, or Mountain so called. But when Francis Pisarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferiour to none) ſome of the Spaniards utterly ignorant of that Language, demanding by ſigns (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a River, or Torrent, or Brook that ran by, the Indians anſwered Peru, which was either the name of that Brook, or of Water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly underſtood them, ſet it down in the Diurnal of their Enterpriſe, and ſo in the firſt deſcription made, and ſent over to Charles the Emperour, all that Weſt part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever ſince as divers Spaniards in the Indies aſſured me; which alſo Acoſta the Jeſuite in his natural and moral Hiſtory of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus alſo findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Jucatan) took that name of Jottan, who as he ſuppoſeth navigated from the utmoſt Eaſt of India to America: it is moſt true, that Jucatan, is nothing elſe in the Language of that Country, but [What is that] or [What ſay you?] For when the Spaniards asked the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the Salvages anſwered Jucatan (which is) What ask you, or What ſay you? The like hapned touching Paria, a mountainous Country on the South ſide of Trinidado and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men do) the names of thoſe new Regions which they diſcovered, pointed to the Hills afar off, one of the People anſwered, Paria, which is as much to ſay, as high Hills or Mountains. For as Paria begins that marvailous ledge of Mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan: from 8 degrees of North Latitude to 52. of South; and ſo hath that Country ever ſince retained the name of Paria.

Riches

The ſame hapned among the Engliſh, which I ſent under Sir Richard Greenevile to inhabit Virginia. For when ſome of my People asked the name of that Country, one of the Salvages anſwered Wingandacon, which is as much to ſay, as, You wear good Cloths, or gay Cloths. The ſame hapned to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Iſland Trinidado: For a Spaniard demanding the name of that ſelf place which the Sea incompaſſed, they anſwered Caeri, which ſignifieth an Iſland. And in this manner have many places newly diſcovered been intituled: of which Peru is one. And therefore we muſt leave Ophir among the Moluccas whereabout ſuch an Iſland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found Gold in Arabia it ſelf (towards Perſia) in Havilah, now Suſiana, and all alongſt that Eaſt Indian ſhore; yet the greateſt Plenty is taken up at the Philippins, certain Iſlands planted by the Spaniards from the Weſt India. And by the length of the paſſage which Salomon's Ships made from the Red Sea, (which were three years in going and coming) it ſeemeth they went to the uttermoſt Eaſt, as the Moluccas or Philippins. Indeed theſe that now go from Portugal, or from hence, finiſh that Navigation in two Year, and ſometimes leſs: and Salomon's Ships went not above a tenth part of this our Courſe from hence. But we muſt conſider, that they evermore kept the Coaſt, and crept by the Shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the uſe of the Compaſs was known, it was impoſſible to Navigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomon's Ships could not find Peru in America. Neither was it needful for the Spaniards themſelves (had it not been for the plenty of Gold in the Eaſt India Iſlands, far above the Mines of any one place of America) to ſail every Year from the Weſt part of America thither, and there to have ſtrongly planted, and inhabited the richeſt of thoſe Iſlands: wherein they have built a City called Manilia. Salomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than Ophir in the Eaſt, to have ſped worſe: neither could he navigate from the Eaſt to the Weſt in thoſe days, whereas he had no Coaſt to have guided him.

Toſtatus alſo gathereth a phantaſtical opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Country, whoſe Mountains of Gold are kept by Griffins; which Mountains Solinus affirmeth to be in Scythia Aſiatica, in theſe words. Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, Griphes tenent Univerſa, alites ferociſſimae, Arimaſpi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas theſe Countries abound in Gold, and rich Stone, the Griffins defend the one and the other; a kind of Fowle the fierceſt of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaſpi make war. Theſe Arimaſpi are ſaid to have been men with one eye only, like unto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes Herodotus and Ariſteus make mention: and ſo doth Lucan in his third Book; and Valerius Flaccus: and D. Siculus in the ſtory of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine own opinion) I believe none of them. And for theſe Arimaſpi, I take it that this name ſignifying One-eyed was firſt given them by reaſon that they uſed to wear a Vizard of defence, with one ſight in the middle to ſerve both Eyes; and not that they had by nature any ſuch defect. But Solinus borroweth theſe things out of Pliny, who ſpeaks of ſuch a Nation in the extream North, at a place called Giſolitron, or the Cave of the North-Eaſt Wind. For the reſt, as all Fables were commonly grounded upon ſome true Stories or other things done: ſo might theſe tales of the Griffins receive this Moral: That if thoſe men which fight againſt ſo many dangerous paſſages for Gold, or other Riches of this World, had their perfect Senſes, and were not deprived of half their Eye-ſight (at leaſt of the Eye of right reaſon and underſtanding) they would content themſelves with a quiet and moderate eſtate; and not ſubject themſelves to Famine, corrupt Air, violent Heat, and Cold, and to all ſorts of miſerable Diſeaſes. And though this Fable be feigned in this place, yet if ſuch a Tale were told of ſome other places of the World, where wild Beaſts or Serpents defend Mountains of Gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the World, eſpecially in America, many high and impaſſable Mountains which are very rich and full of Gold, inhabited only with Tigers, Lions, and other ravenous and cruel Beaſts: into which if any man aſcend (except his ſtrength be very great) he ſhall be ſure to find the ſame War, which the Arimaſpi make againſt the Griffins: not that the one or other had any ſenſe of Gold, or ſeek to defend that Metal, but being diſquieted, or made afraid of themſelves or their young ones, they grow inraged and adventurous. In like ſort it may be ſaid that the Alegartos, (which the Ægyptians call the Crocodiles) defend thoſe Pearls which lie in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the Pearl. And though the Alegartos know not the Pearl, yet they find ſavour in the fleſh and blood of the Indians, whom they devour.

§. VI.

Of Havilah the Son of Joctan, who alſo paſſed into the Eaſt Indies: and of Meſha and Sepher named in the bordering of the Families of Joctan: with a concluſion of this Diſcourſe touching the Plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the Son of Joktan, there is nothing elſe to be ſaid, but that the general Opinion is, that he alſo inhabited in the Eaſt India in the Continent, from which Ophir paſt into the Iſlands adjoyning. And whereas Ganges is ſaid to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the Eaſt India, which took name of Havilah, the Son of Joktan: but Havilah, which Piſon compaſſeth, was ſo called of Havilah, the Son of Chuſh, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: Saul ſmote the Amalekites from Havilah, as thou comeſt to Shur, which is before Ægypt. But that Saul ever made War in the Eaſt India, no man hath ſuſpected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen Sons of Joktan, theſe three Saba, Havilah, and Ophir; though at the firſt ſeated by their Brethren about the Hill Maſius, or Meſh, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) between Cilicia and Meſopotamia; yet at length either themſelves or their Iſſues removed into Eaſt India, leaving the other Families of Joktan, to fill the Countries of their firſt Plantation, which the Scripture deſines to have been from Meſh unto Sephar. And although S. Hierom take Meſh to be a Region of the Eaſt India, and Sephar a Mountain of the ſame (which Mountain Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) thoſe fancies are far beyond my underſtanding. For the Word [Eaſt] in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Judea, is never farther extended than into Perſia. But Meſch is that part of the Mountains of Maſius in the North of Meſopotamia, out of which the River Chaborus ſpringeth which runneth by Charran: and in the ſame Region we alſo find for Sephar (remembred by Moſes) Sipphara by Ptolomy, ſtanding to the Eaſt of the Mountain Maſius; from whence Joktan having many Sons, ſome of them might paſs into India, hearing of the Beauty and Riches thereof. But this was in proceſs of time.

1 Sam. 15. 7.

The other faſhion of Planting I underſtand not being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reaſon and poſſibility. And that this Mountain in the Eaſt was no farther off than in thoſe Regions before remembred, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the ſame phraſe is uſed: as in Numbers 23. Balac the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountain of the Eaſt; which was from the Eaſt part of Meſopotamia. For Balac brought Balaam out of Meſopotamia, (witneſs this place of Deuteronomy.) Becauſe they hired Balaam the Son of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharaiim, to curſe thee: for Aram Naharaiim was Syria fluviorum, which is Meſopotamia, as aforeſaid. V. 7. c. 23. v. 4.

This Plantation of the World after the Flood doth beſt agree, (as to me it ſeems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And theſe be the reports of reaſon and probable conjecture; the Guides which I have followed herein, and which I have choſen to go after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies: be they Antient or Modern. Neither have I any end herein, private, or publick, other than the diſcovery of Truth. For as the partiality of man to himſelf hath diſguiſed all things: ſo the factious and hireling Hiſtorians of all Ages (eſpecially of theſe latter times) have by their many Volumes of untrue reports left Honour without a Monument, and Vertue without Memory: and (inſtead thereof) have erected Statues and Trophies to thoſe, whom the darkeſt forgetfulneſs ought to have buried, and covered over for evermore. And although the length and diſſolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the Worlds firſt Planters after the Flood (I mean the greateſt number and moſt part of them) yet all the footſteps of Antiquity (as appears by that which hath been ſpoken) are not quite worn out nor overgrown: for Babylon hath to this day the ſound of Babel; Phœnicia hath Zidon, to which City the Eldeſt Son of Canaan gave name; ſo hath Cilicia Tharſis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumæans, Lybians, Moors, and other Nations, have preſerved from the death of forgetfulneſs ſome ſigns of their firſt Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Beginning and Eſtabliſhing of Government.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the firſt Government under the Eldeſt of Families to Regal, and from Regal Abſolute to Regal tempered with Laws.

IT followeth now to entreat how the World began to receive Rule and Government, which (while it had ſcarcity of People) underwent no other Dominion than Paternity and Elderſhip. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the Eldeſt of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the Word [Elder] was always uſed both for the Magiſtrate, and for thoſe of Age and Gravity: the ſame bearing one ſignification almoſt in all Languages. For in the eleventh of Numbers God commanded Moſes to gather together 70. of the Elders of the People, and Governours over them: the Hebrew bearing the ſame ſenſe, which the Latin word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Suſanna, Then the Aſſembly believed them as thoſe that were the Elders and Judges of the people. And ſo in the words of thoſe falſe Judges and witneſſes to Daniel, Show it unto us, ſeeing God hath given thee the office of an Elder. Demoſthenes uſeth the ſame word for the Magiſtrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giveth two other reaſons for this appellation: Apud Lacedæmonios qui ampliſſimum magiſtratum gerunt, ut ſunt, ſic etiam appellantur Senes: Among the Lacedæmonians the chief Magiſtrates, as they are, ſo are they called Eldermen: and again, Ratio & prudentia niſi eſſent in ſenibus non summum Concilium Majores nostri appellâssint Senatum: If Reason and Advisement were not in old Men, our Ancestors had never called the highest Council by the name of a Senate. But though these Reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not but in this Name of [Elders] for Governors or Counsellors of State, there is a sign that the first Governors were the Fathers of Families; and under them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word [Signor] and out of it [Seignory] for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) Puissance in Propriety, or proper Power. The kinds of this Seignory, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium, Power or Command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium, Propriety or Mastership: the Correlative of the one is the Subject, of the other the Slave. Ad Cæsarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietas: Cæsar hath Power over all; and every Man Propriety in his own. And again, Cæsar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Cæsar holdeth all in his Power, and every Man possesseth his own. But as Men and Vice began abundantly to increase: so Obedience, (the fruit of natural Reverence, which but from excellent seed seldom ripeneth) being exceedingly overshadowed with Pride, and ill Examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternal perswasions (after Mankind began to neglect and forget the original and first giver of Life) became in all over-weak, either to resist the first inclination of evil, or after (when it became habitual) to constrain it. So that now, when the Hearts of Men were only guided and steered by their own Fancies, and toss't to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the World, while Wisdom was severed from Power, and Strength from Charity: Necessity (which bindeth ever Nature but the immortal) made both the Wise and Foolish understand at once, that the estate of reasonable Men would become far more miserable than that of Beasts, and that a general Flood of Confusion would a second time overflow them, did they not by a general Obedience to Order and Dominion prevent it. For the Mighty, who trusted in their own strengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselves: the feeble fell under the forcible; and the equal from equal received equal harms. In so much that licentious Disorder (which seemed to promise a Liberty upon the first acquaintance) proved upon a better trial, no less perilous than an unindurable Bondage.

Necessitas & summum judicium, & immutabilis providentiæ potestas.

These Arguments by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heavens cover, to subject themselves to a Master, and to Magistracy in some degree. Under which Government, as the change (which brought with it less evil, than the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing: so Time (making all Men wise that observe it) found some imperfection and corrosive in this Cure. And therefore the same Necessity which invented, and the same Reason which approved Sovereign Power, bethought it self of certain equal Rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundless) might also discern her own Limits. For before the invention of Laws, private Affections in Supream Rulers made their own Fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this Yard, and weighing in this Balance both Good and Evil.

For as Wisdom in Eldership preceded the Rule of Kings: so the Will of Kings fore-went the Inventions of Laws. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria Principum pro legibus erant: The People were not governed by any other Laws than the Wills of Princes: Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those Mens vertues value them which were not fansied by their Kings, nor those Mens vices deform them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt, Love sees one while too much, another while stark nothing. Hence it came to pass, that after a few Years (for direction and restraint of Royal Power) Laws were established: and that Government which had this mixture of Equality (holding in an even Balance Supream Power and Common Right) acquired the Title of Regal: the other (which had it not) was known for Tyrannical: the one God established in favour of his People: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the Infancy of this Regal Authority, Princes as they were chosen for their Vertues only: so did they measure their Powers by a great deal of Moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia justi erant, & religionibus dediti, jure habiti Dii & dicti; Princes, because they were just and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods. De aurea sæcula, part. 1.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessity; yet it was God himself that first kindled this Light in the minds of Men, whereby they saw that they could not live and be preserved without a Ruler and Conductor: God himself by his eternal Providence having ordained Kings; and the Law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers over others. For the very Bees have their Prince; the Deer their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their own safety. The most High beareth Rule over the Kingdoms of Men; and appointeth over it whomsoever he pleaseth. Dan. 4. 21. By me (saith Wisdom, spoken by the Son of God) Kings reign; by me Princes rule, and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings: and that this Power is given from God, Christ himself witnesseth, speaking to Pilate, Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above. Prov. 8. ver. 15. Dan. 2. ver. 21. Joh. 19. ver. 21.

It was therefore by a threefold Justice that the World hath been governed from the beginning, (to wit) by a Justice natural: by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephews, and Families, in which Government the Obedience was called Natural Piety: again, by a Justice Divine, drawn from the Laws and Ordinances of God: and the obedience hereunto was called Conscience; and lastly by a Justice Civil, begotten by both the former: and the obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded: and that the Rule in general was paternal, it is most evident: for Adam being Lord over his own Children, instructed them in the service of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had been taught by their Parent, the Father of Mankind.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government with their opposites: and of the degrees of Humane Society.

WHAT other Policy was exercised, or State founded after such time as Mankind was greatly multiplied before the Flood, it cannot be certainly known, though it seem by probable Conjecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first Age: it being possible that many Princes of the Ægyptians (remembred among their Antiquities) were before the general Flood; and very likely, likely, that the cruel Oppreſſions in that Age proceeded from ſome Tyranny in Government, or from ſome rougher form of Rule, than the Paternal.

Beroſ. l. 1. Beroſius aſcribeth the Rule of the World in thoſe days to the Giants of Libanus, who maſtered (ſaith he) all Nations from the Sun-riſing to the Sun-ſet. But in the ſecond Age of the World, and after ſuch time as the Rule of Elderſhip failed, three ſeveral ſorts of Government were in ſeveral times eſtabliſhed among Men, according to the divers natures of places and People.

The firſt, the moſt ancient, moſt general, and moſt approved, was the Government of one, ruling by juſt Laws, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is oppoſed, being alſo a ſole and abſolute Rule, exerciſed according to the Will of the Commander, without reſpect or obſervation of the Laws of God, or Men. For a lawful Prince or Magiſtrate (ſaith Ariſtotle) is the keeper of Right and Equity: and of this Condition ought every Magiſtrate to be, according to the Rule of God's Word. Judges and Officers ſhalt thou make thee in thy Cities: And theſe ſhall judge the People with righteous Judgment.

Deut. 16. ver. 18.

The ſecond Government is of divers principal Perſons eſtabliſhed by Order, and ruling by Laws, called Ariſtocracy, or Optimatum poteſtas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular Faction and Uſurpation of a few great ones) is oppoſed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The third is a State Popular, (or Government of the People) called Democratia, to which is oppoſed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent unjuſt Ruling of the confuſed Multitude, ſeditiouſly ſwaying the State, contrary to their own Laws and Ordinances. Theſe three kinds of Government are briefly expreſt by Tholoſanus; Unius, pauorum, & multorum; Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of Policy ſince the ſecond increaſe of Mankind, the ſame grew in this ſort: Firſt of all, every Father, or eldeſt of the Family gave Laws to his own Iſſues; and to the People from him and them increaſed. Theſe as they were multiplied into many Houſholds (Man by nature loving Society) joined their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicus; of the Greek οἶκος, which ſignifieth a Houſe, or of the word [Via] becauſe it hath divers ways and paths leading to it. And as the firſt Houſe grew into a Village, ſo the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a Society of divers Villages) ſo called of the Greek πηγη, which ſignifieth a Fountain; becauſe many People (having their Habitations not far aſunder) drank of one ſpring or ſtream of Water. To this word the Engliſh Hundreds, or as (ſome think) Shires anſwereth not unfitly.

But as Men and Impiety began to gather ſtrength, and as Emulation and Pride between the Races of the one and the other daily increaſed: ſo both to defend themſelves from outrage, and to preſerve ſuch Goods as they had gathered, they began to join and ſet together divers of their Villages, invironing them firſt with Banks and Ditches, and afterwards with Walls: which being ſo compaſſed were then called Oppida; either ab opponenda ſe hoſtibus, becauſe Walls were oppoſed againſt Enemies, or ab opibus, becauſe thither they gathered their Riches for ſafety and defence: as alſo they were called Urbes, ab orbe; becauſe when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (ſaith Varro) therewith meaſuring and compaſſing the Ground which they went to incloſe or fortifie. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Urbs ſignified no other than the very Walls and Buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: ſo called of Civis; and that, ab eo quòd multitudo coivit, of coming together. But all Inhabitants within theſe Walls are not properly Citizens, but only ſuch as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the Charge of the City, may by turns become Officers and Magiſtrates thereof: the reſt go under the Name of Subjects, though Citizens by the ſame general Name of Subjects are alſo known. For every Citizen is alſo a Subject, but not every Subject a Citizen: perhaps alſo ſome Citizen (as the chief Magiſtrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no Subject; but of this we need not ſtand to inquire. The word [Magiſtrate] is taken à Magiſtro, from a Maſter, and the word [Maſter] from the Adverb Magis (as alſo Magiſteria, Precepts of Art) or elſe from the Greek word [Megiſtos:] and ſo the Greeks call them Megiſtanes, whom the Latins call Magnates or Magiſtratus.

The Office and Duty of every Magiſtrate Ariſtotle hath written in few words. A Magiſtrate or Prince (ſaith he) is the keeper of Right and Equity; but the ſame is beſt taught by S. Paul, who expreſſeth both the cauſe efficient, and final, (that is) by whom Magiſtrates and Princes are ordained, together with their Duties and Offices. A Magiſtrate is the Miniſter of God for thy Wealth; but if thou do evil, fear: for he beareth not the Sword for nought. For he is the Miniſter of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evil. He alſo teacheth in the ſame place, That every Soul ought to be ſubject to the higher Powers, becauſe they are by God ordained; and that whoſoever reſiſteth that Power, reſiſteth God, the giver and fountain thereof: and ſhall not only be therefore ſubject to the judgment and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye muſt be ſubject (ſaith he) not becauſe of Wrath only, but alſo for Conſcience ſake.

V. 1, 2.

Ibid. v. 5.

The Examples are not to be numbred of God's puniſhments upon thoſe that have reſiſted Authority, by God ordained and eſtabliſhed. Neither ought any Subject therefore to reſiſt the Power of Kings, becauſe they may be taxed with Injuſtice or Cruelty: for it pleaſeth God ſometimes to puniſh his People by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandment of Obedience is without diſtinction. The Prophets and Chriſt himſelf ſubjected themſelves to the Power of Magiſtracy. Chriſt commanded that all due to Cæſar ſhould be given unto him: and he payed Tribute for himſelf and Peter. Jeremy commanded the Iſraelites (even thoſe that were Captives under Heathen Kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Jacob bleſſed the King of Ægypt. And it is acceptable in the ſight of our Saviour (ſaith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in Authority: and if for ſuch Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Chriſtian Kings and Magiſtrates. And ſo much did Saint Chryſoſtome in his Homily to the People prefer Monarchical Government, as he rather commended the Rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they ſhould be wanting: Præſtat regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum, Better a tyrannous King, than no King: to which alſo Tacitus ſubſcribeth. Præſtat (ſaith Tacitus in the firſt of his Hiſtory) ſub malo Principe eſſe, quàm ſub nullo; It is better to have a bad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally preſuppoſed) then is there no Liberty more ſafe, than to ſerve them. Neque enim libertas tutior ulla eſt (ſaith Claudian) quàm Domino ſervire bono, No liberty (ſaith he) more safe for us than to be servants to the Vertuous. And certainly howsoever it may be disputed, yet is it far safer to live under one Tyrant, than under 100000 Tyrants: under a wise Man that is cruel, than under the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the Multitude. For as Agesilaus answered a Citizen of Sparta that desired an Alteration of the Government, That kind of Rule which a Man would disdain in his own House, were very unfit to govern great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many Children: and as (for the Reason before remembred) many Households joined themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens joined together, and established Laws by Consent, associating themselves under one Governor and Government, they so joined were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes governed by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the People themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

NOW this first Age after the Flood, and after such time as the People were increased, and the Families became strong, and dispersed into several parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Covetousness being as then but green, and newly grown up, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and budd. For while the Law of Nature was the Rule of Man's Life, they then sought for no larger Territory than themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent Buildings, than sufficient to defend them from Cold and Tempest: they cared for no other delicacy of Fare, or curiosity of Diet, than to maintain Life: nor for any other Apparel than to cover them from the Cold, the Rain and the Sun.

And sure if we understand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Forefathers, this Name may then truly be cast upon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another, (I mean to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and golden Kings make good and golden Ages: and all times have brought forth of both sorts. And as the Infancy of Empire, (when Princes played their Prizes, and did then only woo Men to Obedience) might be called the golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden: for be it that Men effect Honour, it is then best purchased; or if Honour affect Men, it is then that good deservings have commonly the least impediments: and if ever Liberality overflow her banks and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by Policy and Example. But Age and time do not only harden and shrink the openest and most Jovial Hearts, but the Experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torn Estates before their Eyes, and (withall) perswadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings under the Sun whose Means are answerable unto other Men's Desires; yet such as value all things by their own Respects, do no sooner find their Appetites unanswered, but they complain of Alteration, and account the times injurious and Iron. And as this falleth out in the Reign of every King, so doth it in the Life of every Man, if his days be many: for our younger Years are our golden Age; which being eaten up by time, we praise those Seasons which our Youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grievous alterations in our selves, and the Pains and Diseases which never part from us but at the Grave, make the times seem so differing and displeasing: especially the quality of Man's Nature being also such, as it adoreth and extolleth the Passages of the former, and condemneth the present State how just soever. Fit humanæ malignitatis vitio, ut semper vetera in laude, præsentia in fastidio sint; It comes to pass (saith Tacitus) by the Vice of our Malignity, that we always extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious. For it is one of the Errors of wayward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis acti, That they are praisers of forepassed times, forgetting this Advice of Salomon. Say not then, why is it that the former days were better than these? for thou doest not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca, Majores nostri questi sunt, & nos querimur, posteri querentur, eversos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum, & in omne nefas labi: Our Ancestors have complained, we do complain, our Children will complain, that good Manners are gone, that Wickedness doth reign, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all evil. These are the usual discourses of Age and Misfortune. But hereof what can we add to this of Arnobius; Nova res quandoque vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus quibus cæpit nova fuit & repentina: Whatsoever is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they took beginning were also new and sudden. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times have made golden, this we may set down for certain, That as it was the Vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gave them Crowns: so the love of their People thereby purchased, held the same Crowns on their Heads. And as God gave the obedience of Subjects to Princes: so (relatively) he gave the care and justice of Kings to the Subjects; having respect, not only to the Kings themselves, but even to the meanest of his Creatures. Nunquam particulari bono servit omne homin, The infinite goodness of God doth not attend any one only: for he that made the small and the great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which the Kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs; and by a general Love it is, that Princes hold a general Obedience: For Potestas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum; All humane Power is rooted in the Will or Dispositions of Men.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vain vaunt thereof without Vertue.

AND with this Supream Rule and Kingly Authority began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made Election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave Place, Trust and Power. From which Employments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which have continued from Age to Age to these days. But this Nobilty, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the succession of Blood, but to succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient cient for those whose Parents were advanced, to be known for the Sons of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excel, upon whom Glory or Worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in Vertue were so called. Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ aliis notabilis. But after such time as the deserved Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterity, S. Hierom judged of the Succession in this manner. Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent: I see no other thing to be affected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kind of necessity bound not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancestors. For if Nobility be virtus & antiqua divitiæ, Vertue and ancient Riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as Riches, Power, Glory, and the like, do no otherwise define Nobility, than the word [animal] alone doth define a reasonable Man. Or if honour (according to L. Vives) be a witness of Vertue and well-doing: and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of Vertue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like unto Painted and Printed Papers, which ignorant men worship instead of Christ, our Lady and other Saints: Men, in whom there remain but the dreggs and vices of antient Vertue: Flowers, and Herbs, which by change of Soil and want of Manuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains, if in all the rest of their course they run foul, filthy, and defiled? Ex terra fertili producitur aliquando cicuta venenosa, & ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum; Out of fruitful ground ariseth sometime poysoning Henbane: And out of barren Soil pretious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and form, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobility) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobility: the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue and Quality, profitable to the Commonweal. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publick Vertue, serving his Prince and Country, and being descended of Parents and Ancestors that have done the like. And although that Nobility, which the same Author calleth personal, (the same which our selves acquire by our Vertue and well deservings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both natural by descent, and also personal; yet if vertue be wanting to the natural, then is the personal and acquired Nobility by many degrees to be preferred: For (saith this Charron) this Honour (to wit) by descent, may light upon such an one, as in his own nature is a true Villain. There is also a third Nobility which he calleth Nobility in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour: And these be indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies wish they knew well how to wipe off again. But surely if we had as much sense of our degenerating in Worthiness, as we have of Vanity in deriving our selves of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobility (without Vertue) to be Shame and Dishonour, than Nobleness, and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamity is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is born in sin, of a Potshare body and barren mind? for (according to the same Father) Dele fucum fugacis honoris hujus, & male coronate nitorem gloriæ, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting Honour, and the glittering of the ill crowned Glory, that then thou maiest consider thy self nakedly: For thou cameſt naked out of thy Mothers Womb. Camest thou thence with thy Mitre, or glissening with Jewels, or garnished with Silks, or adorned with Feathers, or stuffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certain morning Clouds, which do or will soon pass over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miserable Man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping because he is born, and repining because he is born to Labour, and not to Honour.

Bernard. l. 2. de Consider. ad Eugen. Ca.

For as touching the matter of all Men, there is no difference between it and Dust: which if thou dost not believe (saith S. Chrysostom) look into the Sepulchers and Monuments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily perswade thee by their own example, that thou art dust and dirt: So that if man seem more Noble and beautiful than dust, this proceedeth not from the diversity of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like Soveraign Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to have been of just Authority.

THE first of all that raigned as Soveraign Lord after the Flood was Nimrod, the Son of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to S. Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminency, and because he was the first of Fame, and that took on him to command others: or else in that he was begotten by Chush, after his other Children were also become Fathers; and of a later time than some of his Grand-children and Nephews. Howsoever, seeing Moses in express words calleth Nimrod the Son of Chush, other mens conjectures to the contrary ought to have no respect. This Empire of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannical: The same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to me that Melancthon conceived not amiss hereof: The same exposition being also made by the Author of that work called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter or severe Governour, because his form of rule seemed at first far more terrible than Paternal Authority. And therefore is he in this respect also called a mighty hunter: because he took and destroyed both Beasts and Thieves. But S. Augustine understands it otherwise, and converts the word [ante] by [contra] affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mighty hunter against God, Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, venator contra Dominum, So is that Giant to be understood, a hunter against the Lord. But howsoever this word [a mighty hunter] be understood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinaar: so, this charge was rather given him, than by him usurped. For it is no where found, that Noah himself, or any of the Sons of his own Body came with this Troop into Babylonia: no mention at all being made of Noah (the Years of his Life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrews: Nor that Sem was in this disobedient Troop, or among the Builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by divers antient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Jokkan were the Captains and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himself so far West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sons Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrews (according to the general opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldaa about the City of Ur; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea were no Partners in the unbelieving work of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) did they retain the first and most antient Language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Issues. In familia Heber remansit hæc lingua, In the family of Heber this Language remained (saith S. Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham used: Yea it was antiently and before the Flood the general Speech: and therefore first called (saith Cœlestinus) lingua humana: the humane Tongue. Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 6. c. 11.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Ægyptius, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the Godly Seed of Sem were the chief Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by just Authority, than by violence of usurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three distinct persons.

BEnzo, and out of him Nauclerus with others make many Nimrods. Eusebius confounds him with Belus; and so doth S. Hierom upon Osea: and these words of S. Augustine seem to make him of the same opinion. Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnaverat 65. annos; There did Ninus Raign after the death of his Father Belus, who first governed in Babylon sixty five Years. But it could not be unknown to S. Augustine, that Nimrod was the Establisher of that Empire: Moses being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar: Wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was marvailously replenished. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat, Who was the first that Reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Cæsar overthrew the liberty of the Roman Commonwealth, making himself a perpetual Dictator; yet Augustus was the first Established Emperour: and the first that Raigned absolutely by Sovereign Authority over the Romans, as an Emperour. The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity, laying the foundation of Soveraign Rule, as Cæsar did; and yet Belus was the first, De Civit. Dei.

who peaceably, and with a general allowance exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinon, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200 years after the Flood (as they account) that Belus Raigned: but such agreement of times proves it not. For so Edward the Third, and his Grand-child Richard the Second, were Kings both in one Year: the one dyed; the other in the same Year was Crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plain that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom was Babel, and the Towns adjoyning: but the first and most famous work of Ninus was the City of Ninive.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth that Ninus overcame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered again by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

——Dicitur altam
Coctilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis Urbem.

Semiramis with Walls of Brick the City did inclose.

Further where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty: so Justine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other Kings aswell. For if we may believe Justine; then were Vexoris King of Ægypt, and Tanais of Scythia mighty Kings before Ninus was born. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference between them. For whereas Mercator conceiveth that it was too early for any that lived about the time of the confusion of Languages, to have invaded and mastered those Cities so far removed from Babel, namely Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a Man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I do not find that supposition true, That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them and built them from the Ground, being the first after the Flood, that conducted the Children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The City of Accad which the Septuagint calls Archard, and Epiphanius Arphal; Junius takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Ninive to be one City: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran; but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accadene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierom calls Achad: and so do the Hebrews also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech, S. Augustine Oreg, and Pagninus Erec, this place Junius understands for Arraca in Susiana: but there is also a City in Comegena called Arace: and indeed likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalneh) some take it for Calanisis: of which Am. Marcellinus. Lib. 23. S. Hierom takes it for Seleucia; Hierosolymitanus for Ctesiphon: others do think it to be the Agrani upon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not seated in so divers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdom (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh, in the Land of Shinaar: so as in this Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldæa (being all one) we must find them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think with Viterbiensis, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities far removed, and in several Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Go you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence go you to Hamath, and to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneva Translation favouring the former opi- C. 6. v. 2. nion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a Marginal Note expressing that Shinaar was here named: not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldæa, from Babylon in Ægypt; but I find little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrods Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Ægypt: Babylon of Ægypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where stood Memphis the antient City, but not so antient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now that Chalne is situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and Successive Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

NOW as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great State of Babylon and Assyria: a Controversie wearisomly disputed without any direct proof, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disjoyn the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text. Erat enim principium Regni ejus Babel & Erec, & Accad, & Chalneh, in terra Shinaaris; è terra hac processit in Assyriam ubi ædificavit Niniven: (which is) For the beginning of this Kingdom was Babel, bel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneh, in the Land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this Land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Junius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the Land being so called in Moses's time, and before it. For certainly the other construction, (where the word [Assur] is taken for Assur the Son of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through all the Books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter he setteth down the Sons of Noah in these words. Now these are the Generations of the Sons of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom Sons were born after the Flood: then it followeth immediately. The Sons of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's Sons, be he eldest or youngest: because he was first to be spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and sets down his Issue, and then the Issue of his Sons: first, the Issue of Gomer; Japheth's eldest Son; and then speaks of Javan and his Sons: for of the rest of that Family he is silent. Anon after he numbreth the Sons of Ham, of which Cush was the eldest: and then the Sons of Cush and Mizraim, and afterward of Canaan; leaving Shem for the last, because he would not disjoin the Story of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, unto Abraham; and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the Sons of Shem in the middle of the Generations of Ham, had been against order; neither would Moses have past over so slightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire, in one of the Sons of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the Story of Shem's Sons which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the Sons of Cush, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returns to speak of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the Issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israel. And of Junius opinion touching Assur, was Calvin: to which I conceive that P. Commestor in historia Scholastica gave an entrance, who after he had delivered this place in some other sense, he useth these words. Vel intelligendum non est de Assur filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est) Regnum Assyriorum inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abrahami factum est, (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of Assur the Son of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is the Kingdom of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great Grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the differences in this sort: If you take the Ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true quantum ad initium, respecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true quantum ad Regni ampliationem, regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may add the opinion of Epiphanius confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the Son of Nimrod: and so doth Methodius, and Viterbiensis, S. Hierome and Cyrillus, and now lastly Torniellus: who saith he took upon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus after his Conquest in Africa; and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Osea 5. &c. but to help the matter he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the Son of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Archbishop of Mentz in the Year of Christ 854. an Ancient and learned Writer, understands this place with Commestor, or Commestor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Junius: to which words of Moses he giveth this sence. De hac terra Assyriorum pullulavit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Beli filii, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this Land grew the Empire of the Assyrians who built Ninus the great City, so named of Ninus the Son of Belus. On the contrary Calvin objecteth this place of Isaiah. Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderness; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures that hath a greater diversity in the translation and understanding; insomuch as Michael de palatio upon Isaiah (though in all else very diligent) passeth it over. But Calvin seemeth hereby to infer, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur rather than Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Ninive: contrary to the former translation of Junius, and to his own opinion. Now out of the Vulgar, (called Hierome's translation) it may be gathered that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or City of the Chaldeans, by Isaiah remembred: unto which City, People or Estate, he plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot trust, or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this City of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example unto those Phœnicians, whom in this place he foretelleth of their ruin: which City of Chaldea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their own City of Tyre, (invincible, as themselves thought) should also soon after be overturned by the same Assyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome: Ecce terra Chaldæorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundavit eam, in captivitatem traduxerunt robustos ejus, suffoderunt domos ejus, posuerunt eam in ruinum, (which is) Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, such a People there were not (or this was no People, after the Geneva) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong Men Captive, they undermined their Houses, and ruined their City. The Septuagint expres it but in a part of another Verse, in these words. Et in terra Chaldæorum, & hæc desolata est ab Assyriis, quoniam murus ejus corruit, making the sence perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus understood. If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt have no rest, (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldæans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their Walls fell together to the Ground. Pagninus and Vatablus convert it thus. Ecce terra Chasdiim, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundavit eam navibus, erexerunt arces illius, contriverunt ædes ejus, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished. Behold the Land of the Chaldæans, this People was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a Harbour for Ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and again brake down the Houses thereof, and ruinated it. Junius in the place of Ships sets the word [pro Barbaris] that is, for the Barbarians: and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubted that the Prophet Isaiah (as may be gathered by all the sence of the Chapter)

Torniell. Annal. sacr. in Gen. 10.

did therein assure the Tyrians of their future Destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) he maketh choice to note the Calamities of those places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatness of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis; from the Macedonians, and other Gracians under the name of Citim; also by the Ægyptians, the Chaldæans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Town of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our Discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chief Merchandize came in by the City Ur or Urchoa in Chaldæa, where the Body or chief stream of Euphrates (even that stream which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tigris) had his passage into the Persian Gulf: though now it be stopped up. For (as we have heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the East banks of the Persian Gulf, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their Merchandize by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Ur or Urchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by River and over Land they conveyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they do this day to Aleppo. So then Ur of the Chaldees was a Port Town, and one of those Cities which had intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians; for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldæa, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stopt up. Ejus cursum vetustas abolevit (saith Niger.) And Pliny, Locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen falsum, Time hath worn away the Chanel of Euphrates: and the place where the Mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt Water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the City of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terrour of the Tyrians, to be the City anciently called Ur; and (by Hecatæus) Camerina; by Ptolomy Urchoa: and by the Greeks Chaldæopolis, The City of Chaldæa: which the Sons of Shem until Abraham's time inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Assur the Founder was the Son of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Ur of Chaldæa, were at length oppressed and brought to ruin: which thing God foreseeing, commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus converted [by Ships] do bear that sense, the same may be the better approved, because it was a Port Town: and the River so far up as this City of Ur was in Ancient time Navigable, as both by Pliny and Niger appeareth. And if the word [for the Barbarians] or [by the Barbarians] be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no less manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desart were and are the confronting, and next People of all other unto it. For Chaldæa is now called Arachaldar, which signifieth Desart Lands, because it joineth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Ituræans) addeth that they are of all other People the most Salvage; calling them homines omnium maxime barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former Translation of Junius, nor the interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other Men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Assur is in this place diversly taken (as for the Son of Sem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Ur; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seem to inforce it. And so this founding of the City of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the Posterity of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatry of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to prove that the same Assur built Ninive, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Assur, who was the Son of Shem, both an Idolater, and the Son of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious Sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set up a Statue to be honoured as God. Now if Assur must be of that race, and not of the Family of Sem, as he must be if he founded Ninive, then all those which seek to give him the honour thereof, do him by a thousand parts more injury, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Ninive (and so the Son of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly he was very unworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a City, if no Man have vouchsafed to leave to Posterity his expulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire again, or quitted it to Ninus: whose Acts and Conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) far differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the Story of that Age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first works and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses, and that these works being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the work of Ninus, lying near unto the same stream that Babel and Chalne did: which work his Grand-Child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his Wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to pass, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundress of the City which she only finished: so also Ninus of Ninive. Quam quidem Babylonem potuit instaurare, She might repair or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himself to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built up again some part of the Wall overborn by the fury of the River: which work of his stood till Alexander's time; whereupon he vaunted thus: Is not this great Babel which I have built? Dan. 4. 27.

§. IV.

Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

BUT to return to the Story, it is plain in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugum; and Julius Africanus Surnamed Saturn) was the Establisher of the Babylonian Monarchy, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those four Cities before remembred, Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria; and in Assyria built four more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it self and those adjoining, and that his Travails were many ere he came into Shinaar: that work of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large Foundation of Ninive, Nivive, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of Materials, and with other Impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his Successors in many Years after: to whose Undertakings time had given so great an increase of People; and the examples and patterns of his beginning so great an advancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, à sermonis linguarum terraque divisione, By reason that the Earth and the Speech were then divided.

Belus, or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114 Years; of whose Acts and Undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in disburdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firm Ground of all those great Fens and overflown Marishes which adjoined unto it. For any of his Wars or Conquests there is no Report, other than of his begun Enterprise against Sabatius King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Berosus calls Scythia Saga; whose Son and Successor Barzanes became Subject and Tributary to Ninus, that followed the War to effect, which was by his Father Belus begun.

§. V.

That we are not to marvel how so many Kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

THat so many Kingdoms were erected in all those Eastern parts of the World so soon after Nimrod, (as by the Story of Ninus is made manifest) the Causes were threefold; (namely) Opportunity, Example, and Necessity. For Opportunity being a Princess liberal and powerful bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more Benefits, than either Fortune can, or Wisdom ought; by whose presence alone the understanding Minds of Men receive all those Helps and Supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as every Leader of a Troop (after the division of Tongues and dispersion of People) finding these fair Offers made unto them, held the Power which they possest, and governed by Discretion all those People, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was divided, Mankind straggled abroad like Beasts in a Desart; but that by Agreement they disposed themselves, and undertook to inhabit all the known parts of the World, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinaar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Ninus's time, would not have been possest in many hundreds of Years after, as then they were; neither did those that were sent, and travelled far off (Order being the true Parent of prosperous Success) undertake so difficult Enterprizes without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every Humour that aspired. Thirdly, Necessity resolved all Men by the Arguments of common Miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, nether could those that were laborious, and of honest Dispositions, enjoy the Harvest of their own Travels: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible Violence: nor those which sought after any proportion of Greatness, either possess the same in quiet, or rule and order their own Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the Undertakings and Conquests of Ninus (the Son of Belus) made it apparent: for he found every where Kings and Monarchs, what way soever his Ambition led him in the Wars.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no Companion King, to us known, when he first took on him Sovereignty and sole Commandment of all those the Children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his Life time others also raised themselves to the same Estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his Son and Successor) found Sabatius King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerful to resist his Attempts: which Sabatius I take to be the same, which Justine calls Tanais; and should conjecture, that Mizraim had been his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Justine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many Circumstances seems to me rightly accounted by the judicious and learned Reinecc ius all one with the great Sesostris, that lived certain Ages after Ninus. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65 Years, according to the common Account.

See more of this, l. 2. of this first Part, c. 2. §. 6.

§. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affine unto it.

WHence this second King and Successor of Nimrod had the Name of Bel, or Belus, question hath been made: for it seemeth rather a Name imposed, (or of addition) given by Ninus, than assumed by Belus himself.

Cyrillus against Julian calls the Father of Ninus Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all Men that caused himself to be called a God: which were it so, then might the Name of Belus be thence derived. But Bel, as many learned Writers have observed, signifieth the Sun in the Chaldaan Tongue; and therefore did Ninus and Semiramis give that Name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a God. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by divers others of the Chaldaan Princes, and Babylonians Satrapæ: so was it used (in imitation) by the chief of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians have conceived.

To this Bel, or Belus, pertain (as in affinity) those Voices of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Beelphagor, Belsebub, and Beelsephon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldaan, convert the word Baal by the Latin Princeps militiæ, Chief in the War, though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) ob honorem explicationis arcanarum rerum, In honour of his expounding secrets. S. Hierome makes Bel, Beel, and Baal, to have the same signification: and saith, that the Idol of Babylon was so called, which Ninus in memory of his Father set up to be worshipped: to which that he might add the more Honour and Reverence, he made it a Sanctuary and Refuge for all Offenders. Hence (saith Lyranus) came Idolatry, and the first use of Images into the World. Isidore doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old or ancient; adding, that as among the Assyrians it is taken for Saturn and the Sun: so in the Punick or Carthaginian Language it signifieth God. Glycas makes it an Assyrian name properly; and Josephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idol which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountain Phegor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latins called Priapus, the God of Gardens; which was also the opinion of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth appeareth by the word Beelzebub, the Idol of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel foundeth [God] and Sebub, [Flies or Hornets:] by which Name (notwithstanding) the Jews expreſs the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Oſea teacheth us the proper ſignification of this word from the voice of God himſelf; And at that day (ſaith the Lord) thou ſhalt call me Iſhi, and ſhalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For although the name of Baal, or Bahal, be juſtly to be uſed towards God; yet in reſpect that the ſame was given to Idols, God both hated it and forbad it. And the uſing of the word Bel among the Chaldaans for the Sun, was not becauſe it properly ſignifieth the Sun, but becauſe the Sun there was worſhipped as a God: as alſo the Fire was, tanquam Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belſephon; Belſephon is expounded out of Fagius, Dominus ſpeculæ vel cuſtodiæ, The Lord of the Watch-tower or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idol, and the place wherein it was worſhipped. It is alſo written Belpeor, or Baalpeor: and Peor (they ſay) is as much as Denudavit; and therefore the word joined expreſſeth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus, the Son of Saturn: for it was uſed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturn, the Son Jupiter, and the Grandchild Hercules. Auctor. de aequi. l. 1. Saturni dicuntur familiarum Nobilium, Regum qui urbes condiderunt ſeniſſimi; primogeniti eorum Joves & Junones; Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortiſſimi, The ancienteſt of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturns; their firſt-born Jupiters and Juno's; their valiant Nephews Hercules. But this Belus (ſaith L. Vives) was famous by reaſon of his Warlike Son Ninus, who cauſed his Father to be worſhipped as a God by the name of Jupiter Babylonius, whom the Ægyptians (tranſported by the Dreams of their Antiquity) make one of theirs. Diod. l. 3. For Neptune (ſay they) upon Libya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Jupiter Belus, who was Father to Ægyptus. They add, that this Belus carrying a Colony to the River of Euphrates there built a City, in which he ordained Prieſts after the Ægyptian manner. But were there any Belus the Son of Epaphus and Iſis, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Euſebius) of Telegonus, who after the death of Apis married Iſis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athens) the ſame was not this Babylonian Belus of whom we ſpeak, but rather ſome other Belus, of whom the Ægyptians ſo much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worſhipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, he was the moſt ancient Belus, and the Inventer of Aſtronomy, if Pliny ſay true: from whence the Ægyptians might borrow both the Name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the ſame Author affirmeth that it remained in his time.

Strabo, lib. 13. c. 3. Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus. Over the River (ſaith he) there are Gardens, where they ſay the Ruines of Belus his Tomb, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a ſquare Pyramis made of Brick, a Furlong high, and on every ſide it had a Furlong in breadth. It appears by Cyril againſt Julian, that he obtained Divine Worſhip yet living: for ſo he writes of him (calling him Arbelus. L. 4. cont. Julian. Arbelus, vir ſuperbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à ſubditis Deitatis nomen acciſſe: perſeverârunt igitur Aſſyrii, & ſinistime illis gentes ſacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a Man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the firſt of all Men that was ever honoured by their Subjects with Title of Deity; (or with the Name of God) The Aſſyrians therefore and the bordering Nations have perſevered, ſacrificing to him. Even Arius alſo, whom Suidas calls Thurus, who ſucceeded next after Ninyas, was made an Idol-God among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninyas) Thurus reigned (ſaith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a Man of ſharp and fierce Diſpoſition, who bidding Battel to Caucaſus of the Stock of Japheth ſlew him. The Aſſyrians worſhipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus far Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among idolatrous Nations were Deified in their Life-times, or ſoon after: though I deny not but that the moſt of their Images and Statua were firſt erected without Divine Worſhip, only in memory of the glorious Acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth; and ſo afterward the Devil crept into thoſe wooden and brazen Carcaſes, when Poſterity had loſt the Memory of their firſt Invention. Hereof Iſidore ſpeaketh in this manner. Quos autem Pagani Deos aſſerunt homines fuerunt, & pro uniuſcujuſque vitæ meritis vel magnificentia, coli apud ſuos poſt mortem cœperunt: ſed (Dæmonibus perſuadentibus) quos illi pro ſuæ memoriæ honore vêrunt, univerſos Deos exiſtimârunt: ad iſta verò magis excolenda acceſſerunt Poetarum figmenta, They were Men (ſaith he) whom the Pagans aſſigned to be Gods; and every one for his Merits or Magnificence began after his Death to be honoured of his own. But in length (the Devils perſwading) they accounted them leſſer Gods, whoſe Memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the Opinions (concerning the Honours of the Dead) much more ſuperſtitious.

And that the worſhipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Iſidore alone that witneſſeth; but Gregory: Greg. Nyſſ. cæſar. Gentilitas (ſaith he) inventrix & caput eſt imaginum, Gentiliſm is the Inventreſs and ground of Images: and Ambroſe; Gentes lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei, The Gentiles adore Wood as it were the Image of God. Ambroſ. in Pſal. 101. Euſebius alſo affirmeth as much, and calleth the worſhipping of Images a Cuſtom borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Auguſtine againſt Adimantus. Euſeb. l. 7. c. 18. Et verentur (ſaith Lactantius) ne religio vana ſit, ſi nihil videant quod adorent, They fear their Religion would be vain, ſhould they not ſee that which they worſhip. Aug. c. 14. Lact. l. 2. c. 2.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolmen ſhift this fearful Cuſtom very ſtrangely. For ſeeing the very Workmanſhip is forbidden, how can the Heart of a wiſe Chriſtian ſatisfie it ſelf with the diſtinction of Doulia and Hyperdoulia, which can imply nothing but ſome difference of worſhipping of thoſe Images after they are made? And it is of all things the moſt ſtrange, why religious and learned Men ſhould ſtrain their Wits to defend the uſe of thoſe things, which the Scriptures have not only no where warranted, but expreſly in many places forbidden, and curſed the practiſers thereof. Yet this Doctrine of the Devil was ſo ſtrongly and ſubtilly rooted, as neither the expreſs Commandment of God himſelf, Thou ſhalt not make any graven Image, nor all the threatnings of Moſes and the Prophets after him could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any perſwaſions lead the Hearts of Men from it. For where ſhall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer inſtruction than theſe? Take therefore good heed to your ſelves (for ye ſaw no Image in the day that the Lord ſpake unto you in Horeb out of the midſt of the fire) that ye corrupt not your ſelves, and make you a graven Image, or repreſentation of any figure, whether it be the likeneſs of Male or Female.

And beſides the expreſs Commandment, Thou ſhalt make thee no graven Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, ſo it is written in the Book of Wiſdom, That the invention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredom: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither ſhall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Schoolmen affirm, that the Prophets ſpake againſt the worſhipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifeſt that Moſes ſpake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal and the reſt of that nature, For you ſaw no Image (ſaith Moſes) that day that the Lord ſpake unto you in Horeb. ſurely it was excellently ſaid of Baſil, Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumſcribas eum mente tua, Do not imagin any form to be in God, leſt thou limit or circumſcribe him in thy mind too. Now, if the great Baſil thought it a preſumption unlawful to repreſent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts and minds, how far do thoſe men preſume that put him under the greaſie pencil of a Painter, or the ruſty Ax or other inſtrument of a Carpenter or Carver?

For as this diſhonour to the infinite and incomprehenſible God began in Babel: ſo did the Devil tranſport and ſpeed this invention into all the Regions adjoyning, and into Ægypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while reſiſted the errection of theſe Idols and Images, refuſing to ſet them in their Temples for 170 Years, obſerving therein the Law of Numa: who thought it impiety to reſemble things moſt beautiful, by things moſt baſe. But Tarquinius Priſcus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanity of the Græcians (a Nation of all others under the Sun moſt deluded by Satan) ſet up the Images of their Gods; which (as S. Auguſtine witneſſeth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth. Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis ſupplicant, genu poſito illa adorant, & cum hæc ſuſpiciant, fabros qui illa fecere contemnunt, The Images of the Gods are worſhipped, thoſe they pray unto with bended knees; thoſe they adore, and while they ſo greatly admire them, they contemn the Handicraftſmen that made them: which alſo Sedulius the Poet in this ſort ſcoffeth at.

De Civit. Dei, l. 4. c. 31.

Heu miſeri qui vana colunt, qui corde ſiniſtro
Religioſa ſibi ſculpunt ſimulachra, ſuumque

Quis furor eſt? quæ tanta animos dementia ludit?
Ut Volucrem, turpemq; Bovem, torvumq; Draconem,

Ah wretched they that worſhip Vanities,
And conſecrate dumb Idols in their Heart,
Who their own Maker (God on high) deſpiſe,
And fear the work of their own hands and art.
What fury? what great madeſs doth beguile
Mens minds? that Man ſhould ugly ſhapes adore,
Of Birds, or Bulls, or Dragons, or the vile

And though this device was Barbarous, and firſt, and many years practiſed by Heathen Nations only, till the Jews were corrupted in Ægypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to ſcorn the ignorant ſtupidity of his Nation: but Juſtin Martyr remembred how the Sibyls inveighed againſt Images: and Hoſpinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the Souls of men to erect and adore thoſe Bables. Strabo and Herodotus witneſs, that the Perſians did not erect or ſet up any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus never taught it the Lacedæmonians, but thought it impiety to repreſent immortal natures by mortal figures. Euſebius alſo witneſſeth in his ſixth Book de præparatione Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images ſhould be worſhipped. The ſame do Tacitus and Crinitus report of the Antient Germans. Many other Authors might be remembred that witneſs the diſdain which the Heathen themſelves had of this childiſh Idolatry: of which Hoſpinian hath written at large in his Tract de origine imaginum. And it was truly ſaid, Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta ſunt, All ill examples have ſprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at firſt made theſe Statuæ and Images, but in memory of ſuch remarkable men, as had deſerved beſt of their Countries and Commonwealths: Effigies hominum (ſaith Pliny) non ſolebant exprimi niſi aliqua illuſtri cauſa perpetuitatem merentium: Men were not wont to make pictures, but of men which merited for ſome notable cauſe to be perpetually remembred. And though of the more antient Papiſts, ſome have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appeareth in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elementis literarum, ut per ea diſcerent homines Deum inviſibilem cognoſcere: Images (ſay they, and ſo before them the Heathen ſaid) are inſtead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the inviſible God: in which underſtanding (perhaps) they no otherwiſe eſteemed them than Pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel ſet up in memory of Belus the Babylonian became afterwards the moſt reverenced Idol of the World, by which ſo many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himſelf) were miſled and caſt away: ſo thoſe very Stocks and Stones, and painted Canvaſes (called the Pictures of Chriſt, our Lady, and others) were by thouſands of ignorant people, not only adored, but eſteemed to have life, motion, and underſtanding. On theſe ſtocks we call (ſaith the Book of Wiſdom) when we paſs through the raging Waves, on theſe ſtocks more rotten than the Ship that carrieth us.

This Heathen invention of Images became ſo fruitful in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of Gods, that they were forced to diſtinguiſh them into Degrees and Orders; as Dii Conſentes, ſeu majorum gentium; ſelecti, Patritii, inſigniores, dii medii: Counſelling Gods, or Gods of the mightieſt Nobility, ſelect Gods, Patritian, Gods of mark, and common Gods (which the Romans called Medioxumi) dii infimi, and Terreſtrial Hero's, and multitudes of other Gods: of which S. Auguſtine hath made large mention in his Book de Civitate Dei. But (ſaith Lactantius) among all thoſe miſerable Souls and rotten Bodies, worſhipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretenſis (by what good Angel moved I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the unknown God, which ſtood with the ſame Title and Dedication even to the times of S. Paul: who made them firſt know to whom thoſe Altars belonged, and opened their Eyes which were capable of Grace, that they might diſcern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obſcure and ſtinking miſt wherein the Devil had ſo many years led and miſled them. And it ſufficed not that the multitude of these Gods was so great in general, or that every Nation had some one which took particular and singular care of them; as Jupiter in Creet, Isis in Ægypt, in Athens Minerva, in Samos Juno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts; but every City, and almost every Family had a God apart. For as it is written in the second of Kings: the Men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the Men of Cuth made Nergal, and the Men of Hamath made Ashima, and the Avins made Nibhaz and Tarrack, and the Sephernaims burnt their Children in the fire to Adramelech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Esay derided? Men cut down Trees, rinde them, burn a part of them, make ready their meat, and warm themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a God, an Idol, and prayeth unto it: but God hath shut their Eyes from sight, and their hearts from understanding. It is therefore safest for a Christian to believe the Commandments of God so direct against Idolatry, to believe the Prophets, and to believe S. Paul: who speaketh thus plainly and feelingly. My beloved fly from Idolatry, I speak as unto them which have understanding, judge ye what I say.

§. VIII.

Of the Wars of Ninus: and lastly of his War against Zoroaster.

UNto this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatry, the first that injuriously invaded his neighbour Princes; and the first that without shame or fear commited Adultery in publick. But as of Belus there is no certain memory (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose Story is gathered out of prophane Authors) I find nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Berosus set out and commented upon by Annius hath many good things in it, and giveth great light (as Chytræus noteth) to the understanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Halicarnassæus, and others: yet Lodovicus Vives, B. Rhenanus, and others after them have laid open the imperfection and defects of the fragment; proving directly that it cannot be the same Berosus which lived in Alexanders time, cited by Athenæus and Josephus: and whose Statue the Athenians erected, saith Pliny. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many have gathered the succession of the Babylonian and Assyrian Princes, even from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Ascatades, and to the times of Joshua. For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certain Papers, or some few lines of the Chaldæan and Assyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errours.

Ctesias of Cnidus (a City adjoyning to Halicarnassus) who lived together with Cyrus the Younger, and with Artaxerexes Mnemon, gathered his History out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as far upwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the Story of Cyrus the Younger Xenophon approveth him in some things, and Athenæus, Pausanias and Tertullian cite him; yet so base and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whom he lived, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis; as whatsoever his reports were, times have consumed his works, saving some very few excerptions lately published.

And therefore in things uncertain, seeing a long discourse cannot be pleasing to men of judgment, I will pass over the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can express them. S. Augustine affirms that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wan it all, save India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entred into a straight League of amity, because he commanded many people, and was his kinsman, and a Chuste, and the neerest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprise was upon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because he invaded it on the suddain, and because it lay next him: And also because the Arabians and their King Aricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aid him in his War against Zoroaster: for from Armenia he bent himself that way toward the East; but that ever he commanded the lesser Asia, I do not believe, for none of his successors had any possession therein.

His third War was against Pharnus, King of the Medes, whom it is said that he overthrew, and cruelly murthered with his seven Children, though others affirm that they all dyed in one Battel against him. Whether he invaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Ninive, or after, it is uncertain. It is said that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill success in the first, he returned, and set the work of Ninive forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horse, and 10000. six hundred Chariots: being encountred by Zoroaster with 400000. But Ninus prevailing, and Zoroaster slain, he entred farther into the Country, and besieged the chief City thereof, called Bactra or Bactrion (saith Stephanus:) which by a passage found, and assault given by Semiramis (the Wife of Menon) he entred and possest. Upon this occasion Ninus both admiring her judgment and valour, together with her person and external Beauty, fansied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) he took her from her Husband, whose eyes he threatned to thrust out if he refused to consent. He therefore yielding to the passion of Love in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himself, by the strong perswasions of shame and dishonour, cast himself headlong into the water and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief Author of Magick arts: and of the divers kinds of Magick.

§. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inventor of Astrology, or of Magick: and that there were divers great Magicians of this name.

ZOroaster King of the Bactrians, Vincentius supposeth to be Cham, the Son of Noah: A fancy of little probability. For Cham was the paternal Ancestor of Ninus; the Father of Chus; the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose Son was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincentius had heard of that Book which was called Scriptura Cham, devised by some wicked Knave, and so intituled: of which Sixtus Senensis hath made the due mention.

Cassian. in Oct. Col. c. 21. It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gave the invention of Magick to Cham, the Son of Noah: so did Commester in his Scholastical History: which Art (saith he) with the seven Liberal Sciences he writ in fourteen Pillars: Seven of which were made of Brass, to resist the defacing by the Waters of the Flood; and seven of Brick against the injury of Fire. There was also another devised Discourse, which went under the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like unto this of Commester. These be Cassianus's words. Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibus istis & Sacrilegis fuit artibus infectus, sciens nullum se posse super hiis memorialem librum in Arcam prorsus inferre, in qua erat cum patre justo, &c. Cham (the Son of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions, and Sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any Book or memorial of that nature into the Ark, wherein he was to remain with his godly Father, caused the precepts and rules thereof to be graven in Metal and hard Stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laught at his Birth, when all other Children weep; which presaged the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto: being taken for the inventor of natural Magick and other Arts; for the corrupter, saith Pliny and Justine. But I do not think that Zoroaster invented the Doctrine of the Horoscopes or Nativities: or first found out the nature of Herbs, Stones, and Minerals, or their Sympathetical or Antipathetical workings; of which I know not what King of Chaldea, is also made the Inventor. I rather think that these knowledges were far more antient, and left by Noah to his Sons. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Josephus reporteth) was no less learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisdom of after-times in this, that he knew and acknowleded the true cause, and giver of Life and Vertue to nature and all natural things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and Universal Power) admired the instruments and attributed proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdom, Which being one, and remaining in it self, can do all things and reneweth all. wisd. c. 7.

Now whether this Zoroaster (overthrown by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Pliny finds of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slain by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger. Scalig. in Eusch.

Again, Josephus and Cedrenus affirm that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandring Stars, and other Motions of the Heavens: for if this art had been invented by Zoroaster, he could not have attained to any such excellency therein, in his own life time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular judgment, he might add somewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to Posterity. Josep. l. 1. ant. c. 4.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no less jangling about the word and art of Magick. Arnobius remembreth four to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was given: which by Hermodorus and Dinon seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus overthrew: the second, a Chaldean and the Astronomer of Ninus: the Third was Zoroaster Pamphylius, who lived in the time of Cyrus, and his familiar: the fourth Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hostianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there past 78 Years. Suidas remembreth a fifth, called Persomedus Sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the Son of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chief Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Pliny and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Plethо, Ficinus and Teuchius make him a Chaldean. But by those Books of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation, though the word (Chaldean) was as often given to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishment of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldei and Magi divers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Books, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldean Tongue; and the Comment in the same Language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be judged by the name of those Books of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroastris & Melchior magorum oracula.

§. II.

Of the Name of Magia: and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

Pic. Mir. fol. 81.

NOW for Magick it self; which Art (saith Mirandula) pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt, Few understand, and many reprehend: Et sicut canes ignotos semper allatrant, As Dogs bark at those they know not: so they condemn and hate the things they understand not: I think it not amiss (leaving Ninus for a while) to speak somewhat thereof.

It is true that many Men abhor the very name and word [Magus] because of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but Goes, (that is) familiar with evil Spirits, usurped that Title. For Magick, Conjuring and Witchery are far differing Arts, whereof Pliny being ignorant scoffeth thereat. For Nero (saith Pliny) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdom by his Grace, found the Art after long study and labour altogether ridiculous.

Plin. l. 30. hist. nat.

Porphyr. & Apul.

Plato. in Alcib.

Magus is a Persian word primitively, whereby is exprest such a one as is altogether conversant in things Divine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Art of Magick is the Art of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the word [μάγος] saith, that the Persians called their Gods μάγους: whence he addeth that Magus is either ὁ κατὰ φύσιν θεὸς or θεραπευτὴς θεῶν (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the service of God: in which latter sense it is taken Mast. c. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kind; which Piccolomini calleth Divine Magick: and these did the Latins newly intitle Sapientes or wise men: For the fear and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wisemen the Greeks call Philosophers: the Indians Brachmans: which name they somewhat nearly retain unto this day, calling their Priests Bramines; among the Ægyptians they were termed Priests; with the Hebrews they were called Cabalists, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldaans: and among the Persians Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hostanes, one of the ancient Magicians) useth these words, Et verum Deum merita majestate prosequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed veri, ejus veneration novit assistere, Idem demonas prodit terrenos, vagos, humanitatis inimicos. Sosthenes (for so M. Fœlix calleth him, not Hostanes) *ascribeth the due majesty to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are Ministers and Messengers which attend the Worship of the true God. John Hug. Linschot.

In Octavio Minutii Fœlicis cum Arnobio pag. 360.

His Majesty also in his first Book of Demonologie c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian Tongue the word [Magus] imports as much as a Contemplator of divine and Heavenly Sciences, but unjustly so called, because the Chaldaans were ignorant of the true Divinity. And it is also right which His Majesty avoweth, that under the name of Magick all other unlawful Arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Majesty distinguish it from Necromancy, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magick which His Majesty condemneth, is of that kind whereof the Devil is a Party. Daniel in his second Chapter nameth four kinds of those Wisemen: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, & Chaldei. Arioli the old Latin Translation calleth Sophistes: Vatablus and Paginus Genethliacos, or Physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the Note of Vatablus) Naturalists: Nempè sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) divinarum humanarumque rerum scientiam profitentes, For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Græcians (that is) men that profess the knowledge of things both Divine and Humane. The Greek and the English call them Inchanters; Junius Magicians: Castalion Conjecturers: in the Syrian they are all four by one name called Sapientes Babylonis, The Wisemen of Babel.

Damonolog. l. 2. c. 1.

The second sort Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English call Astrologers, Hierome and the Septuagint Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici, or Venefici; in Hierome, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches, or Poisoners: in Junius Præstigiatores, or Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poisoners; and that indeed there is such a kind of Malefici, which without any art of Magick or Necromancy, use the help of the Devil to do mischief, His Majesty confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Book: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their Practice, to mix the Powder of dead Bodies with other things by the Devil prepared; and at other times to make Pictures of Wax, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Devil by other means bringeth to pass.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldæans: who took upon them to foretell all things to come, as well Natural as Humane, and their events: and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the Stars by them observed, and understood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of Magick, having chiefly sought (as is the manner of all Impostures) to counterfeit the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they have also crept into the inferiour degrees.

A second kind of Magick was that part of Astrology, which had respect to Sowing and Planting, and all kinds of Agriculture and Husbandry: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Stars into those lower Elements.

Philo Judæus goeth farther, affirming that by this part of Magick or Astrology, together with the motions of the Stars and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem, (saith Jo. Damascen.) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the Creature. Josephus reporteth of Abraham that he instructed the Ægyptians in Arithmetick and Astronomy, who before Abraham's coming unto them knew none of these Sciences.

De vit. sanct. Glyc. annal. fol. 180.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo in defence of Mirandula against Garsias. Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium præstantissimus Chaldæos primum, deinde Phœnices, demum Ægyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & divina docuerit: Alexander (saith he) meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirm that Abraham the holiest and wisest of men did first teach the Chaldæans, then the Phœnicians, lastly the Ægyptian Priests, Astrology and Divine Knowledge.

See upon his Comment. in Aug. de civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 2.

The third kind of Magick containeth the whole Philosophy of Nature; not the brablings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost Vertues, and draweth them out of Natures hidden bosome to humane use, Virtutes in centro centri latentes, Virtues hidden in the Center of the Center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus, Arnoldus de villa nova, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these, in elder times, times, and who better understood the power of nature, and how to apply things that work to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus remembred by S. Hierom to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans: among the Indians Thespion: among the Ægyptians Hermes: among the Babylonians Budda: the Thracians had Zamolxis: the Hyperborians (as is supposed) Abbaris: and the Italians Petrus Aponensis. The Magick which these men profest is thus defined. Magia est connexio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant: Magick is the connexion of natural agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise Man to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderful to those that know not their causes. In all these three kinds which other men divide into four, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the Creatour of the Universal: He believeth of the Trinity, which he could not investigate by any natural knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approveth the immortality of the Soul: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charity of the Magi: which Oracles of his, † Psellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others have gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, * Eusebius in the Theology of the Phœnicians using Zoroaster's own words, Hæc ad verbum scribit: (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilium, sempiternus, ingenitus, expers partium, sibiipsi simillimus, bonorum omnium auriga, mulcra non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater juris, sine doctrina justitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacræ naturæ unicus inventor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster, word for word. God the first incorruptible, everlasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himself, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the Best, the Wisest, the Father of right, having learn'd justice without teaching, perfect wise by Nature, the only inventor thereof.

* De præp. Evang. l. 1. c. 7.

L. 2. fol. 45. Sixtus Senensis speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldeans, doth distinguish those wise Men into five Orders, (to wit) Chascedim, or Chaldeans: Asaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which he translates Arioli, or Sophists) Mecasphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poysoners; and Gazarim Augures, or Aruspices, or Diviners.

Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldæans, which were Astronomers, His cœlorum motus diligentissime spectârunt, These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the Heavens: Whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the Old Latin Translation called Philosphers: of the Septuagint and of Hierom Magicians, qui de omnium tam divinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt, Who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well divine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the Son of Beor) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the invention of this art to Zoroastres the Persian.

Lart. l. 1.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith S. Augustin, Pliny, and Justin) of another Zoroastres: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which he received from his Ancestors.

Mecasphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those of which we have spoken already out of his Majesty's Book of Dæmonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after S. Hierom) which Divine from the Entrails of Beasts slain for Sacrifices: or by Gazarim others understand Augures, who Divine by the flying, singing, or feeding of Birds.

By this distinction we may perceive the difference between those wise men which the Kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the antient Persians was most honest. For as Peucer truly observeth, præerant religioni Persicæ, ut in populo Dei Levitæ, studiisq; vere Philosophiæ dediti erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamq; percepisset. The Magi (saith he) were the chief Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Levites among Gods people, and they were given to the studies of true Philosophy: neither could any be King of the Persian, who had not first been exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Migi. Sixtus Senensis in defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus hath two kinds of Magick, his own words are these. Et ne quem moveant præmissa Polychronii & Theophili testimonia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam; alteram ubique ab Origene damnatam, quæ per fœdera cum dæmonibus inita aut vere aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origene laudatam, quæ ad practicen naturalis Philosophiæ pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad invicem agentium ac patientium. That the testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not move any man, it is to be understood that Magick is of two sorts, the one every where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by Covenants made with Devils: the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practick part of natural Philosophy, teaching to work admirable things by the mutual application of natural Vertues, agent and suffering, reciprocally. This partition Hierom doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries upon Daniel: where considering of the difference which Daniel makes between these four kinds of wise men formerly remembred, he useth this distinction; Quos nos Hariolos; cæteri vocabulo (id est) Incantatores interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; Malefici, qui sanguine utuntur & victimis, & sæpe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldæis Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro Maleficis accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldæorum: & ad artis hujus scientiam Reges quoque & Principes ejusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate Domini salvatoris ipsi primum ortum ejus intellexerunt, & venientes in sanctam Bethlehem adoraverunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente. They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, seem to me such as perform things by words; Magicians, such as handle every thing Philosophically; Witches, that use Blood and Sacrifices, and often lay hands on the Body of the Dead: further, among the Chaldæans I take them to be signified by the name of Conjecturers upon Nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custom takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their own Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldæans: Yea Kings and Princes of that Nation do all that they do according to the knowledge of this art: whence at the Nativity of the Lord our Saviour they first of all understood his Birth, and coming unto holy Bethlehem did worship the Child: the Star from above shewing him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference between the Doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirm that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere facto utitur Diaboli opera ad rem quamcunque; That he is called a Magician now adays, who having entred league with the Devil, useth his help to any matter; yet (as our Saviour said of Divorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisdom of nature; other Arts which undergo that title were invented by the falshood, subtlety and envy of the Devil. In the latter there is no other doctrine, than the use of certain ceremonies per malam fidem: by an evil faith: in the former no other ill, than the investigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that work to things that suffer. And though by the Jews, those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, and Divines which came to Worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecasphim; yet had they no other reason than common custom therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro Maleficis accipit, Common custom (saith S. Hierom) understandeth Witches under the name of Magicians: And antiquity (saith Peter Martyr) by the word [Magi] understood good and wise men. Quid igitur expaveſcis Magi nomen formidoloſe, nomen Evangelio gratioſum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, ſed ſapientem ſonat & Sacerdotem? O thou fearful one (saith Ficinus) why doubtest thou to use the name of Magus, a name gratious in the Gospel, which doth not signifie a Witch or Conjurer, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that study and profession but only idle ignorance: the Parent of causeless admiration? Causa fuit mirificentia quorundam operum, quæ re vera opera naturalia sunt: veruntamen quia procuratione dæmonum naturas ipsas vel conjungentium, vel commiscentium, vel aliter ad operandum expedientium facta sunt, opera dæmonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus hujusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi improprie vocant. The marvelousness of some works, which indeed are natural, hath been the cause of this slander: but because these works have been done by procurement of Devils joining the natures together or mingling them, or howsoever fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the works of the Devils by the ignorant. Among these works is natural Magick, which men call very improperly Necromancy.

Peucer. de divinat. in c. de mag. fol. 135 & 136.

Rib. l. 6. fol. 424.

Fol. 80.

Mirandula in his Apology goeth further: for by understanding (saith he) the uttermost activity of natural agents we are assisted to know the Divinity of Christ: for otherwise (to use his own words) ignoratis terminis potentiæ & virtutis rerum naturalium stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia. The terms or limits of natural power and vertue not understood, we must needs doubt whether those very works which Christ did, may not be done by natural means: after which he goeth on in this sort. Ideo non hæretice, non superstitiose dixi, sed verissime & Catholice, per talem Magiam adjuvari nos in cognoscenda Divinitate Christi, Therefore I said not Heretically, not Superstitiously, but most truly and Catholickly, that by such Magick we are furthered in knowing the Divinity of Christ. And seeing the Jews and others the Enemies of Christian Religion, do impudently and impiously object, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not above nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula a man for his years fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason avow, that the uttermost of natures works being known, the works which Christ did, and which (as himself witnesseth) no man could do, do manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held nature therein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely Supream and Divine: and thereby those that were faithless, were either converted or put to silence.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the antient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Devil here as in other kinds hath sought to obtrude evil things under the name and colour of good things.

Seeing therefore it is confessed by all of understanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than divinorum cultor & interpres, A studious observer and expounder of Divine things: and the art it self (I mean the Art of natural Magick) no other, quam naturalis Philosophiæ absoluta consummatio, Than the absolute perfection of natural Philosophy: Certainly then it proceedeth from common ignorance, and no way forteth with wise and learned Men promiscue, and without difference and distinction, to confound lawful and praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to use S. Paul's words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Devil hath shuffled in, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth graceless Men. For if we condemn natural Magick, or the wisdom of Nature, because the Devil (who knoweth more than any man) doth also teach Witches and Poysoners the harmful parts of Herbs, Drugs, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we by the same rule condemn the Physician, and the Art of healing. For the Devil also in the Oracles of Amphiaraus, Amphilochus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreams what Herbs and Drugs were proper for such and such Diseases. Now no man of judgment is ignorant, that the Devil from the beginning hath sought to thrust himself into the same imployment among the Ministers and Servants of God, changing himself for that purpose into an Angel of light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrology, by giving a Divine power to the Stars, teaching men to esteem them as Gods, and not as Instruments. And (as Bunting observeth) it is true, that judicial Astrology is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art; considering that heavenly Bodies (as even general experience sheweth) have and exercise their operation upon the inferiour. For the Sun, and the Star of Mars do dry; the Moon doth moisten, and govern the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they have several and proper names, so have they several and proper vertues: the Stars do also differ in beauty and in magnitude; and to all the Stars hath God given also their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Stars, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestial influences, the Devil ceaseth not to shuffle in his superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret vertues of nature hath he fastened his Doctrine of Characters, numbers, and incantations; and taught Men to believe in the strength of Words and Letters: (which without faith in God are but Ink or common breath) thereby either to equal his own with the all-powerful word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Bunt. in Chron.

Psal. 147.

Moreover, he was never ignorant, that both the wise and the simple observe when the Sea-birds forsake the Shores and fly into the Land, that commonly some great Storm followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken fair weather; that the crying of Crows and bathing of Ducks foreshew rain: for they feel the Air moistened in their Quills. And it is written in

Jeremy

Ca.8.ver.7. Jeremy the Prophet, Even the Stork in the Air knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Mankind working upon these as upon the rest of Gods Creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to observe the flying of Fowles, and thereby to judge of good or ill success in the War: and (withal) to look into their Entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of unsearchable providence in the Livers and Bowels of Birds and Beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreams, not only to warn and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Gen.12.17. Abimelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because he admonisheth Joseph, and by Dream informed Jacob, Laban, Pharaoh, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembred in Job 33.17. Job: In Dreams and Visions of the night when sleep falleth upon men, &c. then God openeth the ears, that he might cause man to return from his enterprise: therefore, I say, doth the Devil also practise his divinations by Dreams, or (after Parisiensis) divinitatis invitationes, his mock Divinity. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his own Dreams: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yea the Romans finding the inconvenience hereof, because all Dreams (without distinction of causes) were drawn to divination, forbad the same by a law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis somniis occultam aliquam artem divinandi) it may appear. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomy cap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slain. Yet it is not to be contemned that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dream for two grievous Diseases that oppress him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Ptolomy's poysoned wound; nor that which S. Augustin reporteth of a Millanoise; whose Son (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paied, was told by his Father in a Dream where the acquittance lay to discharge it; nor that of Astyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all which, forasmuch as the cause is not in our selves, this place denieth dispute.

§. IV.

That Daniel's misliking Nabuchodonosor's condemning of the Magicians doth not justifie all their practices.

BUT it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathens commonly used were to be condemned in them, who took on them very many and strange Revelations: how came it to pass that Daniel both condemned the hasty sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldaa, and in a sort forbad it? especially considering that such kind of people God himself commanded to be slain. Deut. 13. & 18. Levit. 20. To this divers answers may be given. First it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldæans, because they acknowleded that the Dream of the King, which himself had forgotten, could not be known to any man by Art, either Natural or Diabolical: For there is none other (said the Chaldæans) that can declare it before the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with fl sh: and herein they confessed the power of the ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned Men, some of them did not exercise themselves in any evil or unlawful Arts, but were meerly Magicians and Naturalists: and therefore when the King commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, and called it a hasty judgment, which proceeded with fury without examination. And that some of those mens Studies and Professions were lawful, it may be gathered by Daniel's instruction: For himself had been taught by them, and was called chief of the Inchanters; of which some were termed Soothsayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldæans, others Magi or Wisemen: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the Execution of that Judgment, because it was unjust. For howsoever those Men might deserve punishment for the practice of unlawful Arts (though not unlawful according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltless. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Devil himself could not know. So then in Daniel's dislike, and hindering of the Execution of sentence of Death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute justifying of their practice and Profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.

NOtwithstanding this mixture every where of good with evil, of falsehood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity: The good, The truth, The purity in every kind may well be embraced: As in the antient worshipping of God by Sacrifice; there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all Power, because the Devil in the Image of Baal, Astaroth, Chemoth, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like was so adored.

Neither did the abuse of Astrology terrifie Abraham (if we may believe the most ancient and Religious Historians) from observing the motions and natures of heavenly Bodies; neither can it dehort wise and learned Men in these days from attributing those Vertues, Influences, and Inclinations to the Stars and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to those his glorious Creatures. Euseb. et Artapan. & Polybist.

The Sympathetical and Antipathetical working of Herbs, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmost Vertues sometimes taught by the Devil, and applied by his Ministers to harmful and uncharitable ends, can never terrifie the honest and learned Physician or Magician from the using of them to the help and comfort of Mankind: neither can the Illusions, whereby the Devil betrayeth such Men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the observations of Dreams; so far as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make use of them.

Lastly, the prohibition to mark flying of Fowls (as signs of good or evil Success) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows against rain, or to any observation not superstitious, and whereof a Reason or cause may be given. For if we confound Arts with the abuse of them, we shall not only condemn all honest Trades and enterchange among Men (for there are that deceive in all Professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent Knowledge and all Learning, or obscure and cover it over with a most scornful and beggerly ignorance: and (as Pliny teacheth) we should shew our selves ingratos erga eos, qui labore curaq; lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce, Unthankful we should shew our selves towards those, who with pains and care have discovered unto us light in this light. Deut. 18. 20.

Indeed not only these natural knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks also and Professors thereof: though those that are excellently learned judge of it in this sort. In speculo Mathematico Verum illud, quod in omni scibili quæritur, relucet; non modo remota similitudine, Cusan. Comp. Theolog. c. 1.

similitudine, sed fulgida quadam propinquitate. In the glass of the Mathematicks that truth doth shine, which is sought in every kind of knowledge; not in an obscure Image, but in a near and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawful Magick.

IT is true that there are many Arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the name of Magick: and esteemed abusively to be as Branches of that Tree, on whose Root they never grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy or Goëtia: and of this again there are divers kinds. The one is an Invocation at the Graves of the Dead, to whom the Devil himself gives answer in stead of those that seem to appear. For certain it is, that the Immortal Souls of Men do not inhabit the dust and Dead Bodies, but they give motion and understanding to the living: Death being nothing else but a separation of the Body and Soul: and therefore the Soul is not to be found in the Graves.

A second practice of those Men, who pay Tribute, or are in League with Satan, is that of conjuring or of raising up Devils, of whom they hope to learn what they list. These Men are so distract, as they believe that by terrible words they make the Devil to tremble; that being once impaled in a circle (a circle which cannot keep out a Mouse) they therein (as they suppose) insconce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtless they forget that the Devil is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodness, no, not by the fearful word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to sit in Gods seat, that he made no scruple to tempt our Saviour Christ, whom himself called the Son of God. So, forgetting these proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch will yet resolve himself, that he can draw the Devil out of Hell, and terrifie him with a phrase: whereas in very truth, the obedience which Devils seem to use, is but thereby to possess themselves of the Bodies and Souls of those which raise them up; as His Majesty in his Book aforenamed hath excellently taught, That the Devils obedience is only secundum quid, scilicet ex pacto; respectivè, that is, upon bargain.

Sunt in mundo genus quoddam potestatum valde divisum, indiscretum & inconsideratum; & quod neque verum à falso, neque possibile discernit ab impossibili. L. Vives in cap. 11. li. 10. Aug. de Civit. Dei, li. 10. Cusan. exerc. l. 2.

I cannot tell what they can do upon those simple and ignorant Devils, which inhabit Iamblicus's imagination; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come uncalled: and alwaies attending the cogitations of their Servants and Vassals, do no way need any such inforcement.

Or it may be that these Conjurers deal altogether with Cardan's mortal Devils, following the opinion of Rabbi Avernathan and of Porphyrius who taught that these kind of Devils lived not above a thousand Years: which Plutarch in his Treatise de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great God Pan. For were it true that the Devils were in awe of wicked Men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwaies fear those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when he had lifted him up in the Air, cast him headlong out of his Claws, when he was sure he should perish with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peter's Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same prank at other times upon his own accord the Devil plaied with Theodotus: who transported (as Simon Magus was supposed to have been) had the same mortal fall that he had. The like success had Budas, a principal Pillar of the Manichean Heresie, as Socrates in his Ecclesiastical History witnesseth: and for a manifest proof hereof we see it every day, that the Devil leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himself a Pegasus, to convey them in hast to places far distant, or at least makes them so think: For to those that received not the truth (saith S. Paul) God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majesty in the second Book and the fourth Chapter of the demonologie, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are meerly illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Crystals: of whom Cusanus: Fatui sunt incantatores, qui in ungue & vitro volunt spiritum includere: quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore, They are foolish Inchanters which will shut up their Spirits within their nails or in Glass: for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a Body.

Li. 1. c. 5.

Exercit. l. 2.

There is also another Art besides the aforementioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven, and communicate withal. But the administring Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creatour: so seeing they are most free Spirits; there is no Man so absurd to think (except the Devil have corrupted his Understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by threats. Wherefore let the Professours thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed purity of life, by the ministry of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immaterial substances and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or inforcement, are Men of evil Faith and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Devils which willingly obey.

Gal. par. de univ. fo. p. 2. c. 7

Other sorts there are of wicked divinations: as by Fire, called Pyromantia: by Water, called Hydromantia: by the Air, called Mateotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Fascination or Witchcraft: the practisers whereof are no less envious and cruel, revengeful and bloody, than the Devil himself. And these accursed Creatures having sold their Souls to the Devil, work two waies; either by the Devil immediately, or by the Art of Poisoning. The difference between Necromancers and Witches, His Majesty hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Devil.

There is another kind of petty Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call Charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his Shoulder in the Olympian Fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconry, yet was it no more to be admired than Mahomet's Dove, which he had used to feed whith Wheat out of his Ear: which Dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's Shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his breakfast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly if Bankes had lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the Inchanters of the World; for whosoever was most famous among them, could never master or instruct any Beast as he did his Horse.

For there are many fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as Womens hair burnt, and the like. So many things may be laid in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magick or Inchantment, than to draw out a Mouse with a piece of toasted Cheese.

§. VII.

Of divers waies by which the Devil seemeth to work his wonders.

BUT to the end that we may not doat with the Manichees, who make two powers of Gods: that we do not give to the Devil any other Dominion than he hath (not to speak of his Ability, when he is the minister of Gods vengeance, as when Ægypt, according to David, was destroyed by evil Angels) he otherwise worketh but three waies. The first is by moving the cogitations and affections of Men: The second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot work what they would, G. Parisiensis giveth three causes: the first a natural Impotency: the second, their own Reason disswading them from daring over much, or indeed (and that which is the only certain cause) the great mercy of the Creatour, Tenens eas ligatas (saith the same Author) velut immanissimas belluas. S. Augustine was of opinion that the Frogs which Pharaoh's Sorcerers produced were not Natural, but that the Devil (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appear to be such. For as Vairus observeth, those Frogs of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not Creatures indeed. Hereof saith S. Augustine, Nec sanè dæmones naturas creant, sed quæ à Deo creata sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt, The Devils create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seem to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giveth the reason, Dæmon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentiæ, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Devil fills with certain Clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beam of the mind is wont to open the light of reason.

Gul. paris. de univers. p. 2. c. 70.

And as Tertullian in his Book de anima rightly conceiveth, if the Devil can possess himself of the eyes of our minds, and blind them, it is not hard for him to dazle those of the Body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Devil entereth in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the Soul: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vain apprehensions.

Maxima vis est phantasiæ ad errores.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogs were not imaginary, but such indeed as they seemed: not made magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the art, but (according to Thomas) per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem, By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and S. Augustine in another case like unto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his Companions into Birds, per activa cum passivis, incline th rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that S. Augustine believed that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a Man very learned also confirmeth. For speaking of Natural Magick he useth these words. De huiusmodi autem operibus est subita generatio ranarum & pediculorum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verùm adhibitis adjutoriis, quæ ipsa semina naturæ confortant & acuunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus naturæ videatur (quæ tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia dæmonum, &c. to which he addeth. Qui autem in hiis docti sunt talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in hiis glorificant: In such works (saith he) the sudain generation of Frogs, and Lice, and Worms, and some other Creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so hasten the work of Generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the work of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they think it is done by the power of Devils. But they who are learned in these Arts marvail not at such working, but glorifie the Creatour. Now by these two waies the Devils do most frequently work, (to wit) by knowing the uttermost of Nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or unsearchable power, but of God only.

De leg. c. 24. fol. 67.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes Thunders, Lightnings, and Tempests; and can infect the Air, as well as move it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also Natural? Or may it be objected that he foretelleth things before they happen, which exceedeth Nature, and is no illusion? it is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? In elder Ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he foretold the Death of Saul, at such time as he was in his own Possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancy of the World to this day, and observed the success of every Council: he that by reason of his swift motions can inform himself of all places, and preparations: he that is of Counsel with all those that study and practise subversion and destruction: he that is Prince of the Air, and can thence better judge, than those that inhabit the Earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if he should not very oftentimes guess rightly of things to come (where God pleaseth not to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wise and learned Men do oftentimes by comparing like Causes conceive rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Devil doubteth and would willingly keep his credit, he evermore answereth by Riddles, as

If Crœsus over Halys go,
Great Kingdoms he shall overthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own Kingdom, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Devil may proceed in Predictions, which otherwise belong to God only; as it is in Isaiah. Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods: shew us at all times and certainly what is to come. Solius enim divinæ intelligentiæ ac sapientiæ est occulta nosse & revelare. It is only proper to Gods understanding and wisdom to know and reveal hidden things.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the Devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, It may be objected that the Devil hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power have done the like, as in the example given of Samuel raised by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed that some of the Devils acts exceed all the powers of nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Justine Martyr was sometimes of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed: and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgensis; from which authorities those men borrow strength which so believe. But Martyr changed his opinion: and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For in his questions upon the Old and New Testament he accounteth it detestable to think that it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect. In requie sunt animæ piorum à corpore separatæ, impiorum autem pœnas luunt, donec istarum ad vitam æternam, illarum vero ad æternam mortem quæ secunda dicitur corpora revivisc ant. The Souls of the godly separated from their Bodies are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the just rise to Eternal life, and of the wicked to an Eternal and second death.

Just Martyr in colloq. cum Tryphone in resp. ad Ortho. quæst 52. Ambr. in Luk. li. 1. ca. 1. Lyra in Reg. 1. Aug. ad Simpl. l. 2. q. 3. De Civit Dei li. 13. ca. 8.

And (besides S. Augustine) Justine Martyr, Hilarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostom and others believed firmly, and taught it: that the Souls of men being once separate from their bodies did not wander on the Earth at all. Credere debemus (saith Cyril) quum à corporibus sanctorum animæ abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris bonitati divinæ commendari. We must believe when the Souls of holy men are departed from their Bodies, that they be commended to the Divine Goodness as into the hands of a most dear Father. If then they be in Heaven, the power of the Devil cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, ab inferno nulla est redemptio, from Hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death; Unum (saith Augustine) in igne æterno; alterum in regno æterno: The one in eternall Fire; the other in Gods eternal Kingdom. And though it be written in Jure Pontificio, that many there are who believe that the Dead have again appeared to the living; yet the Gloss upon the same Text finds it ridiculous. Credunt & male, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Gloss) They believe, and they beleve amiss, because they be but Phantasms, or Apparitions. For whereas any such voice hath been heard, saying, I am the Soul of such a one; hæc oratio à fraude atque deceptione Diabolica est. That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Devil, saith Chrysostom. Likewise of the same saith Tertullian. Absit ut animam cujuslibet Sancti, nedum Prophetæ, à dæmonio credamus extractam. God forbid that we should think that the Soul of any holy Man, much less of a Prophet, should be drawn up again by a Devil.

26. q. 5. Episcopi.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition Samuel; so do they the wooden Images Cherubins: and false brazen Gods are called Gods: and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a Book not numbred among the Canonical Scriptures, as S. Augustin himself in his Treatise, if it be his, de cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth) yet Siracides following the Literal sense and Phrase of the Scriptures, proveth nothing at all: For though the Devil would willingly perswade, that the Souls (yea even of just Men) were in his power, yet so far is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods just and merciful Nature, and so contrary to all Divine reason, as Saint Augustin (or whosoever wrote that Book before cited) might rightly term it a detestable opinion so to think. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him either by dreams, by Urim, or by his Prophets: it were sottish to conceive, that he would permit the Devil, or a wicked Witch to raise a Prophet from the Dead in Saul's respect: it being also contrary to his own Divine Law to ask Counsel of the Dead; as in Deuteronomy 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the Devil, and not the Soul of a dead Body, that gave answer and advice.

1 Kings 17. 22. 2 Kings 4. 34.

But because Helias and Helizeus had raised some from the Dead by the power of God; those Devils which S. Augustine calleth ludificatores animantium sibi subjectorum, mockers of their own Vassals, casting before their Eyes a semblance of humane Bodies, and framing sounds to their Ears like the voices of Men, do also perswade their graceless and accursed attendants, that themselves both possess, and have power over the Souls of Men. Eludit Diabolus aciem tum spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium saith L. Vives, The Devil beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Devils power, whom if we will not fear, we must fear to sin. For when he is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himself his voluntary Vassal: potest ad malum invitare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustin, he can allure, but he cannot inforce to evil. Such as think otherwise may go into the number remembred by Lucretius.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable Buildings of Ninus, and of his Wife Semiramis : and of other of her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magificent Building of Ninive by Ninus : and of Babylon by Semiramis.

BUT to come back to Ninus the amplifier and finisher of Ninive; whether he performed it before or after the overthrow of Zoroaster, it is uncertain. As for the City it self, it is agreed by all prophane Writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compass 440. stadia, or furlongs; the Walls whereof were an hundred foot upright, and had such a breadth as three Chariots might pass on the Rampire in front: these Walls were garnished with 1500 Towers which gave exceeding beauty to the rest, and a strength no less admirable for the nature of those times.

Justin. l. 1. Diod. li. 2. Sabel. l. 8 1.

But this City (built in the Plains of Assyria, and on the Banks of Tigris, and in the Region of Eden,) was founded long before Ninus's time; and (as antient Historians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campsor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gave it a Wall, and called it after his own name.

For these works of Babylon and Ninive begun by Nimrod in Chaldaa, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Ninive, Semiramis Babylon: wherein she sought to exceed her Husband by far. Indeed in the first Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded: labouring to build Towns and Villages for the use of themselves and their People without either Walls or Towers; and how they might discharge the Earth of Woods, Briars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it the more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that Age, when Ambition was in strong youth: and purposing to follow the Conquest which her Husband had undertaken, gave that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

Herod. li. 1. Justin. l. 1. Diod. li. 2. & 3.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus : and beginning of Semiramis Reign.

THis she did after the death of her Husband Ninus: who after he had mastered Bactria, and subjected unto his Empire all those Regions between it and the Mediterran Sea and Hellespont (Asia the less excepted) and finished the work of Ninive, he left the World in the year thereof 2019 after he had Raigned 52 years. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her Husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute Sovereign power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenaus, and others, speaks of five days. In which time (moved either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her Husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her Husband to be slain. But this seemeth rather a scandal cast on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

However Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his Seat from Babylonia in Chaldea to Ninive in Assyria. Justin reports that Semiramis (the better to invest herself, and in her beginning without murmur or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented herself to the people in the person of her Son Ninias or Zameis, who bare her external form and proportion without any sensible difference.

Ælian. li. 7. & Diodor.

This report I take also to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable Acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that Letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and undertaken Conquest) by her own name. And were it true that her Son Ninias had such a Stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that she could have held the Empire from him 42 years after by any such subtilty: (for so long she Reigned after the death of her Husband:) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholely given to his pleasures as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous government and undertakings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis Parentage, and Education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

SOme Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous Woman to have been of base Parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her City wherein she was born, Semiramis Ascalonitis; of Ascalon, the antient City and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the Daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Ascalon exceeding beautiful. Others say that this Derceta or Dercetis the Mother of Semiramis was sometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a Temple dedicated seated on the bank of a Lake adjoyning to Ascalon; and afterward falling in love with a goodly young Man she was by him made with Child, which (for fear of extream punishment) she conveyed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high Reeds which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the Child was left to the mercy of wild Beasts) the same was fed by certain Birds, which used to feed upon or near those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adjoyning to this Lake had the charge and fosteridge of this Child, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the Mother might thereby hope the better to cover her dishonour and breach of vow; notwithstanding which she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoining, and (as the Poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her Face, which still held the same Beauty and human shape. It is thought that from this Derceta the Invention of that Idol of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a Mans Face, and a Fishes Body: into whose Temple when the Ark of God was brought, the Idol fell twice to the Ground: and at the second fall there remained only the Trunk of Dagon, the head being broken of: For so S. Hierom hath converted that place. Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius write it by Dagon only, which signifieth a Fish, and so it only appeared: the Head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the Body.

For my self I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistims was an Idol representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods under Neptune. For this City being maritimate (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phœnicia) used all their devotions to Neptune, and the rest of the petty Gods which attended him.

§. IV.

Of her expedition into India, and death after discomfiture; with a note of the improbability of her Vices.

BUT for her Pedigree I leave it to the Assyrian Heralds: and for her vitious life I ascribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Grecians. For delicacy and ease do more often accompany licentiousness in Men and Women, than labour and hazzard do. And if the one half be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princess more worthy of fame than Semiramis was, both for the works she did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the Wars she made with glorious Success: all but her last Enterprise of India; from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she never returned: and that of all her most powerful Army there survived but only twenty Persons: the rest being either drowned in the River of Indus, dead of the Famine, or slain by the Sword of Staurobates. But as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbred: so were those that returned less than could have escaped of such an Army, as consisted of four millions and upwards. For these numbers which she levied by her Lieutenant Derceteus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horsemen one million; of Chariots armed with hooks on each side one hundred thousand; of those which fought upon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all uses three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads three thousand, by which she might transport over Indus at once three hundred thousand Soldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and Men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the Earth was able to nourish (had every Man and Beast but fed upon Grass) are taken from the Authority of Ctesias: whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himself hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Army (though the same was far inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to overload the belief of any reasonable Man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Army of 1700000 and gathered together (therein to pass the Hellespont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the several Provinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

Suid. f. 845. lit. S.

But of what multitude soever the Army of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken, and overthrown by Staurobates upon the Banks of Indus, canticum cantavit extremum: she sang her last Song; and (as Antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the Gods into a Dove, (the Bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their Ensigns.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramids of Ægypt.

AMong all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (besides the Wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, invironed with a Wall carried four square of great height and beauty, having on each square certain brazen Gates curiously Engraven. In the Core of the square she raised a Tower of a furlong high, which is half a quarter of a Mile; and upon it again (taking a Base of a less circuit) she set a second Tower; and so eight in all, one above another: upon the top whereof the Chaldeans Priests made the observation of the Stars, because this Tower overtopped the ordinary Clouds.

By beholding the ruins of this Tower have many Travellers been deceived; who suppose that they have seen a part of Nimrod's Tower, when it was but the Foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of Frankincense every Year (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorn with the spoils of Jerusalem, and of the Temple of Salomon: all which Vessels and Ornaments Cyrus redelivered. This Temple Zerxes evened with the soil; which Alexander is said to have repaired by the perswasions of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might have been in his desire so to do; but he enjoyed but a few Years after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any such work. The Ægyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and level Ground, and given to the same superstition of the Stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same service and use, the Pyramids by Memphis, which were conspicuæ undique navigantibus, saith Pliny. Of these Pyramids Bellonius a careful observer of rarities (who being in Ægypt mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report. Le meilleur archer qui seroit a sa sommite, & tirant une fleche en l'air, à peine pourroit l'envoyer hors de sa base qu'elle ne se tombast sur les degrez. The best Archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramids, and shooting an Arrow from thence into the Air as far as he can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall upon some of the degrees or steps.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the Birth of Abraham: And of the use of this Question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

Of some of the Successors of Semiramis: With a brief transition to the Question, about the time of the Birth of Abraham.

AFter the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zamis succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Annianus bestows the Conquest of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Justin, Orosius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninias being esteemed no Man of War at all, but altogether Feminine, and subjected to Ease and Delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of jealousie he every year changed his Provincial Governours; and built Colledges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his Successor, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that he reduced again the Bactrians and Caspians, revolted as it seemeth in Ninias his time: nor of Aralius, the Successor of Arius, but that he added sumptuosity, invented Jewels of Gold and Stone, and some Engines for the War: I will for this present pass them over; and a while follow Abraham, whose ways are warrantable, (till we meet these Assyrians again in this Story) by whom, and by whose Issues we shall best give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralius, and Xerxes or Balæus. For otherwise if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judge of those times, which the Scriptures set us down without error, by the Raigns of the Assyrian Princes; we shall but patch up the Story at adventure, and leave it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures do not help us, Plutarch saith, Nam non est in rebus antiquis Historia, nisi quæ certa est: No marvel if then in things very Ancient, History want assurance.

The better therefore to find out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian Kings Reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abraham's Birth, and in what Year the same hapned after the Flood. Now since all agree, that the forty third year of Ninus was the Birth-year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what year after the Flood the Birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much jangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. years; others 352. years between Abraham's Birth and the Flood: a matter often disputed, but never concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we find him in Annius) makes but 250. years from the Flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was born in the forty third year of Ninus, according to Eusebius, and St. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the year of Abraham's Birth was in the year after the Flood 293. or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, since I do here enter into that never resolved question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoveth me to give reason for my own opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those Darts, which Envy casteth at novelty, than to go on safely and sleepily in the easie wayes of Ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

§. II.

A proposal of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292. after the Flood, and not in the year 352.

THose which seek to prove this account of 292. years, between the general Flood and Abraham's Birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scripture. So Terah lived 70. years, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly upon the opinion of Josephus, St. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, and many of the Ancient Hebrews before them: Authorities (while they are slightly lookt over) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembred, the latter Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lie; that Terah at 70. years begot Abraham, Nahor and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the Son of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest Son of Terah, and so necessarily born in the seventieth year of his life. Secondly it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was Heir of the Blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set down the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest Son, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtful. For it cannot then be proved, that Abraham was born more assuredly in the 130. year of Terah's age, than in the 131. 132. or 140. For no where let down perciselie that Abraham went into Canaan that very year, in which his Father died.

Fourthly it is thought improbable, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. year: seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. years.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

TO answer all which objections it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by divers learned Divines long since, and to which I will add somewhat of mine own, according to the small talent which God hath given me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, unless the time of Abraham's journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend unto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so far, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his Travels, that serveth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwark against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceived that Abraham made two journies into Canaan: the latter after his Fathers death, the former presently upon his calling, which he performed without all delay, not staying for his Fathers death at Haran: a conjecture, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God, to go out into a place, which he should afterward receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the supposition it self. Heb. 11. 8. Gen.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proved, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of St. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct and plain, what force hath any Mans fancy or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two journies into Canaan; one before Terah's death, and another after: no such thing being found in the Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any Man out of this place before alledged can pick any argument, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I think it reason, that he be believed in the rest. But that he performed the Commandment of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith the Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, Act. 7. 4. Heb. 11. 8.

teth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembred the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abraham's coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Jews his adversaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himself, and the Gospel of Christ. Indeed we shall find small reason to make us think that Abraham passed and repassed those waies, more often than he was enforced so to do, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome journey, than the strength of his Faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would have brought him to despair, he had more cause than ever Man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn Nations: a Nation of valiant and resolved Idolaters. He was besieged with Famine at his first arrival, and driven to fly into Ægypt for relief. His Wife was old, and he had no Son to inherit the Promise. And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himself for Sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent.

Secondly, let us consider the waies themselves, which Abraham had to pass over, the length whereof was 300. English Miles: and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great River of Euphrates, to travel through the dangerous and barren Desarts of Palmyrena, and to climb over the great and high Mountains of Libanus, Hermon or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as afore-said, 300. Miles in length, let every reasonable Man judge. For if he traveled it twice; then was his journey in all 1800. Miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy; the manner of Abraham's departing from Haran hath more proof, that he had not animum revertendi, not any thought looking backward, than any Mans bare conjecture, be he of what Antiquity or Authority soever. For thus it is written of him. Gen. 12.5. Then Abraham took Sarah his Wife, and Lot his Brothers Son, and all their substance that they possest, and the Souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the Land of Canaan, and to the Land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his Wife, and Kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if he could have been thereto moved, it is more likely that he would have then returned, when he was yet unsetled, and prest with extreme Famine at his first arrival. For had his Father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Ægyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might be of Abraham's return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have sent him back thither, about the time of his Fathers Death: so they perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second Voyage their opinion were not maintainable, One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain, if it be not over-troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which as we read, was within four or five years after that time his greatest, or (as may seem) his only care? Did not he bind with a very solemn Oath his principal Servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to travel into those parts, and seek out a Wife for Isaac his Son? and doth it not appear by all circumstances, that neither he nor his Servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly design any one Woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within four or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of such importance; but would have trusted his own judgement in chusing a Woman, fit for her Piety, Vertue, and other desireable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his only Son, who was then 35. years old; before which age most of the Patriarchs after the Flood had begotten Children, rather than have left all at randome to the consideration of a Servant, that nither knew any, nor was known of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot this business when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which no Man can devise. What might be the reason, that Abraham's Man in doing his Masters errand was fain to lay open the whole Story of his Masters Prosperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had born to him a Son in her old Age? If Abraham himself, a more certain Author, had so lately been among them, would not all this have been an idle tale? It were needless to stand long upon a thing so evident. Whether it were lawful for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable: considering how averse he was from permitting his Son to be carried thither, even though a Wife of his own Kindred could not have been obtained without his personal presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither by his Parents, to take a Wife of his own Lineage; not without Gods especial approbation, by whose Blessing he prospered in that journey: yet he lived there as a Servant; suffered many injuries; and finally was driven to convey himself away from thence by flight. For although it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be observed, that God alloweth not in his Servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken and transplanted them. That brief saying, Remember Lot's Wife, contains much matter. Let us but consider Mesopotamia from whence Abraham was taken, and Ægypt out of which the whole Nation of the Israelites was delivered: we shall find, that no Blessing issued from either of them, to the Posterity of the Hebrews. When Ezechias was visited with an Honourable Embassy from Babel, it seems that he conceived great pleasure in his mind, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the Prophecy which thereupon he heard by Isaiah, made him to know, that the Counsel of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following Generation, when by the Waters of Babylon they sat down and wept. Concerninig Ægypt we read, that Sesac and Neco Kings of Ægypt brought calamity upon Israel: also that their confidence in the Ægyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Ægypt I do not remember, nor can readily find; but it is found in Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more return that way; which is given, as the reason, why their King might not cause the People to return to Ægypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: that he never did return, all circumstances do (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham's is but an imagination: and that imaginations of Men are rather valuable among Children, than that they can perswade those of judgment or understanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the Travels of Abraham are precisely set down in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Camerina in Chaldea to Haran or Charran: and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he removed to a Mountain between Bethel and Hai: thence into Ægypt: from Ægypt he returned thither again, where Lot and he parted, because their Flocks and Herds of Cattle were more, than could be fed in that part: from thence the second time he removed to Mamre, near Hebron: and thence having pursued Amraphel, and reicued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumæa, under Abimelec: and after near unto it at Bersabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his Son Isaac on the Mountain Moriah. But this Fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one Story, either Divine or Humane. Now if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Levita in his Cabala hath feigned, it should in reason be therewithal believed, that he would in those his first Travels have provided himself of some certain seat, or place of abiding: and not have come a second time, with his Wife, Kinsmen, Family, Goods and Cattle, not knowing whereon to rest himself. But Abraham, when he came from Charran, past through the North part of Canaan, thence
Gen. 12. v. 6. to Sichem, and the Plain of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to Bethel and Hai: and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and find out some fit habitation: from whence again, as it is written in Genesis the eleventh, He went forth, going and journeying towards the South: and always unsetled. By occasion of which wandring to and fro, some say, the Ægyptians gave him and his the name of Hebræi.
Mont. in Caleb. Further, to prove that he had not formerly been in the Country, we may note, that ere he came to Bethel and Hai, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him saying, Unto thy Seed will I give this Land, shewing it him as unto a Stranger therein, and as a Land to him unknown. For Abraham without any other provident care for himself, believed in the word of the living God: neither sending before, nor coming first to discover it; but being arrived he received a second promise from God, that he would give those Countries unto him and his Seed to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should move any man to think, that Moses would have omitted any such double journy of Abraham's, seeing he setteth down all his passages elsewhere, long and short? As when he moved from Sichem, and seated between Hai and Bethel: the distance being but twenty Mile: and when he moved thence to the Valley of Mamre, being but twenty four Miles: and when he left Mamre, and sat down at Gerar, being less than six Miles; no, Moses past over all the times of the first Age with the greater brevity, to hasten him to the Story of Abraham: shutting up all between the Creation and the Flood in six Chapters; which age lasted 1656 Years: but he bestoweth on the Story of Abraham fourteen Chapters, beginning with his Birth in the eleventh, and ending with his Death in the five and twentieth; and this time endured but 175 Years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abraham's Travels, or other actions: or that he would set down those small removes of five Miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a journey in going and coming would have ministred some variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inserting and adding to Abraham's Story.

§. IV.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth Year.

NOW touching the Objection, where it is said, that it was very unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. Year, seeing Abraham himself thought it a wonder to have a Son at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed miscast, and mistaken: Abraham having respect only to Sarah his Wife, when he spake of their many Years. For when the Angel said unto Abraham in his Tent door at Mamre; Lo, Sarah thy Wife shall have a Son, it followeth in the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were old and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of Women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is said it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of Women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second Wife Keturah had many Sons after Sarahs death, as Zimron, Jockshan, Medan Midian, Ishback, and Shuah: and the Eldest of these was born 37. Years after Isaac: and the youngest divers Years after. What strangeness then, that Terah being 130. Years old should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despair of Abraham at one hundred Years? For Sarah dyed in the Year of the World 2145. and Isaac was born in the year 2109. and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat five Sons 36. years after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137. years old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed and Jesse, who lived so many years and Ages after Abraham, begat Sons at 100. years or near it, it cannot be marvailed at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. and Abraham others at the same Age and seven years after.

§. V.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the objections: shewing that we may have certainty of Abraham's Age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Son: and that there was great cause, why in the Story of Abraham his two Brethren should be respected.

IT followeth now to speak something to the objection, which brings Abraham's age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest Son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70 years old. For Abraham's age being made uncertain, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certain of Abraham's age, unless we make him the eldest Son, is false. For it is plain in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the Year of his Death, then was Abraham 75. And if you ask, how I can judge of times, either preceeding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, that St. Stephen hath told us, that Abraham's departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75. Year of Abraham was the 205. Year of Terah: which known, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the objection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect unto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the Flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary Causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the Issues of Nahor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nahor was the Father of Bethuel and Bethuel of Rebecca the Mother of Israel: and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was Mother to Isaac, and Grand-mother to Jacob: Milcah also the Wife of Nahor, and Mother of Bethuel, was Jacob's great Grand-mother: and the age of Sarah the Daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a Son at 90. years, and when by Nature she could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nahor and Abraham married the Daughters of their Brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the Grand-child of Nahor; and Jacob Lea and Rachel, the Daughters of Laban, the Grand-child also of Nahor: it was not superfluous in Moses to give light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange Gods, as it is Josh. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to think, that they still continued Idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their Natural Country, and City of Ur in Chaldæa, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldæa; but Lot, his Son, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the Sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor also, who remained at Charran, gave his Sons Daughters to Isaac and Jacob, his own kinsmen: he himself having also married in his own Family; not thinking it pleasing unto God to mix themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these Men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seen the Servant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he invited him to his Fathers House in this manner: Come in thou blessed of Jehovah, &c. And when this Servant of Abraham's demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said; This thing is proceeded of Jehovah: meaning that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods Providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, take, go, that she may be thy Masters Sons Wife, even as Jehovah hath said. This their often using of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, is a sign that they had the knowledge of him. Gen. 24. v. 31. Gen. 24. v. 50.

Now although it be the opinion of Saint Chrysostom, and some later writers, as Cajetan, Oleaster, Musculus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certain Idols, or houshold Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he believed in the true God, it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abraham's Servant, Blessed of Jehovah, as aforesaid. So as for my self I dare not avow, that these Men were out of the Church, who sure I am were not out of the Faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. ver. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons proving that Abraham was not the eldest Son of Terah.

TO the main objection which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to shorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldest Son of Terah, and born in the 70. Year of Terah's life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And Terah lived 70. Years and begat Abraham, Nahor and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proof at all that he was the eldest and first-born Son of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in Blood and Birth, neither doth it appear that it pleased God to make especial choice of the first Sons in Nature and time: for Seth was not the first-born of Adam: nor Isaac of Abraham: nor Jacob of Isaac: nor Juda and Joseph of Jacob: nor David the eldest of Jesse: nor Salomon of David: as is formerly remembred. Gen. 11. v. 26.

But it is written of Noah; Noah was 500. years old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham and Japhet: shewing that at the 500. year of his Age he began to beget the first of those three Sons. For according to S. Augustine speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo nativitatis, sed significatio futuræ dignitatis: in qua excelluit Abraham. The order of nativity is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignity: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore as in the order of the Sons of Noah: so is it here; where it is said that Terah lived 70 years and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sons, himself being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah; for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130. Enosh Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahalaeel at 70. Mahalaeel Jered at 60. Noah was yet 500. years old when he began to beget the first of his three Sons as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terah's Sons, than Aug. quæst. super Gen. 25.

than otherwise: though for his excellency he was worthily named first. His own words are these: Fieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentiæ, qua in Scripturis valdè commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later; but was first named in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last, proveth nothing who was first or last born: either in those Issues of Noah or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in Nature, as touching his election or spiritual Blessing: for Moses nameth first the Children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods favour. Pietas ergò vel ipsa potiùs electio divina, quæ comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare. Piety, saith he, or rather Divine Election, which doth evermore draw with it or after it piety and the fear of God, gave place: and precedency to Sem among the Children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. year of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had lived 86. years. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100. years. It was from the Valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he rescued Lot and overthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83 years: and it is as manifest that he parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if Terah begat Abraham at 70. years old, then must Abrabraham have been 135. years when he first set his Foot in Canaan: seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. made 205. the true age of Terah, which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembred. For he entred at 75. he rescued Lot at 83. he had Ismael at 86. he had Isaac at 100. proved by the former places.

Gen. 12. 4. Gen. 16. 16. Act. 7. 4. & Gen. 14.

Moreover if Abraham were the eldest Son of Terah, and born in the 70. year of his age: then had Terah lived till Isaac had been 35. years old, and Ismael 49. both which must then have been born in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: unless we should either deny credit to St. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his Fathers death: or else give credit to the interpretation of Daniel Angelocrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greek word μετὰ, may be transported by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terah's death, which were 60. years before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to have been born in the 70. year of Terah; we must give those times and places of Birth to Abraham's Children, which no Authority will warrant; For Abraham had no Children in Ur of Chaldæa, nor in Haran: nor in 10. years after his arrival into Canaan. For the year of Terah's death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the year of the World 2083: and the year of Ismael's Birth was the Worlds year 2094. which maketh 10. years difference. And that Isaac was born in Canaan, and was to be offered upon the Mountain Moriah therein, 39. Miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the Valley of Mamre, no Man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot be that any of Abraham's Sons were born in Mesopotamia: nor while Terah lived: nor in less than 10. years after Terah's death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest Son of Terah, nor born in the 70. year of Terah's age.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75. if Terah had begotten him at 70. then had Terah lived but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also have been the full age of Terah: but Terah lived 205. years: and therefore was not Abraham born in the 70. year of Terah. Gen. 11.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest Brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Iscah wanted but 10. years of Abraham's age: Isaac being born when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. years old.

It followeth then that if Abraham had been the elder Brother of Haran, Haran must have begotten Sarah at 9. years old: for granting that Haran was born but one year after Abraham, and Sarah within 10. years as old as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran beget her, when he had lived but 9. years; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Iscah was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification; and names of Principality. Again, to what end was the word Iscah or Iiscah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? for to speak of any thing superfluous it is not used in Gods Books: and if Iscah had not belonged to the Story, it had been but an idle name to no purpose remembred.

Now if it had been true (as those of the contrary opinion affirm) that Moses had no respect of Nachor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the Parents of Bethuel and Rebecca, the Mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Iscah in this place, were she not Sarah, but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first or last.

The age also of Lot disproveth the eldership of Abraham: for Lot was called an old Man when Abraham was but 83. years: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah, Abraham marrying one of Haran's Daughters, and Nahor the other, Sarah also being within 10. years as old as Abraham: it may appear to every reasonable Man (not obstinate and prejudicate) that Haran was the eldest Son of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first and before his Father left Ur in Chaldæa. Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abraham's eldership, upon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10. years younger than Abraham himself. Lyra his words are these. Si igitur Haran fuit junior ipso Abraham, sequitur quòd non habebat decem annos quando genuit Saram: imò nec octo, &c. and afterward, & ideò melius videtur dicendum, quòd Abraham fuit ultimò natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter ejus dignitatem: & quia ponendus erat caput stirpis & generationis sequentis: & quia primò facta est ei repromissio expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum est de Sem, &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham himself, it followeth, that he was not 10. years old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the last born of the three Sons of Thare, nevertheless he is named first for his dignity, both because he was to be ordained head of the stock and Generation following: and because the promise of Christ was first made unto him, as before it is said of Sem.

§. VII.

§. VII.

A conclusion of this Dispute, noting the authors on both sides: with an admonition that they which shorten the times make all ancient Stories the more unprobable.

IT therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest Son of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was born in the 130. year of Terah's life, and not in the 70. year. For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed when he was 75. years old, these two numbers added make 205. years, the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my self, I have no other end herein than to manifest the truth of the Worlds Story: I reverence the judgements of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars. Saint Augustine was doubtful, and could not determine this controversie. For what soever is borrowed from him out of his 16. Book de Civitate Dei, cap. 15. the same may be answered out of himself in his five and twentieth question upon Gen. But S. Augustine herein followed Josephus, and Isidore: and Beda followed S. August. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanity, that the Hebrews and Josephus sought to make Abraham the first-born: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Josephus together with Nicholas Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorify the Jewish Nation) make Abraham a King, entitling Sarah by the name of Queen Sarah: and said that Abraham was followed with 318. Captains, of which every one had an infinite multitude under him; trecentos & octodecim præfectos habuit: quorum singulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Pharaoh invading him with a great Army, took from him his Wife Sarah. Such fables argue that Josephus is not to be believed, but with discreet reservations.

Act. 3. 4.

Gen. 12. 4.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. years from the Flood to Abraham, is upheld by many of the Hebrews. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their judgement in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would have appeared in setting down the succession of the Persian Kings, under whom they lived, whose History was not so far remote in time, as these antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good Writers. Yet grosly have they erred therein, and so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldom find their opinion rehearsed with out the confutation treading on the heels of it. They of the Roman Religion are also generally on the same side: it being a thing usual among them, to maintain whatsoever they have been formerly known to hold and believe. Contrarywise, of the more ancient, Theodoret, and some following him: of later times Beroaldus, Codoman, Peucer, Calvin, Junius, Beza, Broughton. Doct. Gibbons, and Moor, with divers of the Protestants, hold Abraham to have been born in the 130. year of his Father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) divers of the same Religion, and those nevertheless good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chitræus, Functius and others, are very averse herein, especially Josephus Scaliger with his Sethus Calvisius, proclaiming Beroaldus an Arch-heretick in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poisonous. Contrariwise Augustinus Torniellus a Priest of the Congregation of S. Paul, a judicious, diligent, and free Writer, whose Annales are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which I have already delivered: not alledging Beroaldus, nor any Protestant Writer, as being perhaps unwilling to owe thanks to Hereticks. For my self I do neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this larger account of times, because many notable Men of the Protestant Writers have approved it; but for the truth it self. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all Men of judgement, that the best approved Historians, Divine and Prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the stories, and forepast actions of the World: and not the truth of Histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgment to our selves, which of these two accounts give the best reputation to the Story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new Plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Josephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292. years, or thereabouts, between the Flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. years between the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first-born of Thare, in the 70. year of his life: the other a younger Son of Thare, and born when he had lived 130. years. And if we look over all, and do not hastily satisfie our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being satiated do slothfully and drowsily sit down; we shall find it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some Editions, make it above 1072. years between the Flood and Abraham's birth: than to take away any part of those 352. years given. For if we advisedly consider the State and countenance of the World, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea, before Abraham was born, we shall find that it were very ill done of us, by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over-deeply between Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too near the quick, the reputation of the whole Story might perchance bleed thereby, were not the testimony of the Scripture supream, so as no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withal this precept of St. Augustine, That whersoever any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation misunderstood. For in Abraham's time all the then-known parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and all the bordering Countries: yea, all that part of the World besides, as far as India: and those not built with sticks, but of hewen Stones, and defended with Walls, and Rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquity, than those other Men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvels? giving also strength thereby to common Cavellers, and to those mens apish brains, who only bend their wits to find impossibilities, and Monsters in the Story of the World and Mankind.

§ VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the Story of Abraham.

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alledged I conclude, that from the general Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. years were consumed:

An. mundi 2008. dil. 352. natus Abraham. Euseb. August. de Civit. Dei, l. 16. c. 17.

sumed: and taking the Assyrian History with us, the same number of years were spent from the Flood to the 43. year of Ninus: in which 43. year of Ninus Abraham was born: which happned in the year of the World 2009.

Now of this time of 352. years, we must give one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that staid in the East, to wit, 30. year to Chus, ere he begat Sheba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first Sons, we may the more safely give the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Havila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was born, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approveth. Giving then 30. years more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five years to the five elder Brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. years were consumed ere Nimrod himself was born! and that Raamah had that age ere any of his Sons were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparison: for Peleg, the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Regu in the same year of his Life.

Aug. de Civit. Dei.

Gen. 11. 18.

Let us then allow 60. years more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other Generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel: for sure we are that it was done by Hands, and not by Miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125: The rest of the time of 131. (in which year they arrived in Shinar whereof there are 6. years remaining) we may give them for their Travels from the East: because they were pestered with Women, Children and Cattle: and as some ancient Writers have conceived, and Becanus of later times, they kept always the Mountains sides, for fear of a second Flood. Now if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus, before Abraham born: Both which S. Augustine approveth: which two numbers taken again out of 221. there remaineth 114. years of the 352, from the Flood to Abraham's Birth: which number of 114. necessity bestoweth on Nimrod.

An. à salute humani generis ab aquis centesimo primo cœpit regnum Babyloni cum sub nostro Saturno patre Jovis Beli qui imperavit annis 65. Berosus.

And if it be objected that this time given to Nimrod, is over long: sure if we compare the Age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appear over-short. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but one hundred seventy nine years: whereof he Raigned one hundred and twelve: whereas Sale who was the Son of Arphaxad the Son of Sem, lived four hundred and thirty three years: And of the same Age of the World was Nimrod, the Son of Chus, the Son of Cham.

Now after Abraham was born

Ninus Reigned 9. years: which added to 43. make 52.

Ninus dyeth and leaveth Semiramis his Successor.

Semiramis governed the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42. years, and dyed in the 52. year compleat of Abraham's life.

Of the World 2017.

Ninias or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. years, in the second year of whose Reign Abraham left Mesopotamia.

Of the Flood 761. 2059. mundi, 403. à dil. 2083. 427. 2093. 437.

When Abraham was 85. years old, he rescued his Nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprise Amraphel King of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninia Reigned 38. years, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. years after Semiramis dyed: which was the 75. year of his Age: So that Amraphel may seem to have been this Ninias the Son of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. year, as aforesaid, being the 75. year of Abraham, he and his Fellow-Kings might have received this overthrow in the 85. year of Abraham, and the 33. year of his own Reign: after which he Reigned five years: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Assyrian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we have set them down, according to the times noted by Moses, in the Story of Abraham, it is most certain: unless we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation, which were impiety: or account the whole History of Ninus and Semiramis to be a Fiction; which were to condemn all Ancient Historians for Fablers.

That Amraphel, one of the four Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the Son of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. year of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33. year of the Reign of Ninias Zameis the King of the Assyrians, the Son of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirm what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then Reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it self as most probable, is that which hath been already noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis or Basan, and overthrew those five Kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was King of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the Successor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. Year of Abraham's life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarch: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the Valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or of the five Cities, were the Vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written. Twelve years were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. year they rebelled, and in the 14 year came Chedorlaomer and the Kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorl. the principal in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated over Tigris, and to the East of Amraphel's Country; and the other two Kings, which were Companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it self, seemeth at this time to have had no great scope or large Dominion. For had Amraphel been so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, he should not have needed the assistance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little Kings of Sodom, Gomorrha, &c. were his Vassals, and not Amraphel's) yet this makes not the conjecture less probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninias. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a down-right fall, at the time of this War: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdoms between India and the Phœnician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

Gen. 14.

§. X.

Of Arioch another of the four Kings: and that Elias, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Cœlesyria and Arabia Petræa.

NOW the two other Kings joyned with Amraphel, and Chedorl. were Arioch and Tidal; the one King of Ellassar, the other of the Nations. For Ellassar, Aquila and Hierom write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellespont: which opinion Pererius favoureth. But this is only to defend the Latin Translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellespont far distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petræa, or into Idumea: which Countries these four Kings chiefly invaded. Besides that, it is certain, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had never any Dominion in Asia the less. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the Less as Commanders; but used all the art they had to invite Crœsus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himself, and the other Kings of those parts, than the success of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made War with Bera, King of Sodom, Birsha King of Gomorrha, Shinab King of Admah, and Shemeber King of Zeboim, and the King of Bela which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kind of Reguli, as Joshua found in the Land long after: Namely Lords of Cities and small Territories adjoyning; of which Canaan had 33. all slain or hanged by Joshua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power: And therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellespont, had manifested a great impotency and weakness in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

Xenophon.

Gen. 14.

And though it be alledged for an example, that divers Kings far off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to fear the greatness of these petty Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the World were fixed on Cæsar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no less doubtful than fearful: But the whole Country by these four Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward given to the half Tribe of Manasseh, Gad, and Ruben: a narrow valley of Ground lying between Jordan and the Mountains of Seir: inclosed by the River of Arnon on the South side, and by Libanus on the North, consisting of the two small Provinces of Traconitis or Basan, and the Region of the Moabites: a Conquest far unvaluable, and little answering the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable Estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subjected all the great Kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellespont, or any other part of Asia the less. But as the Vulgar and Aquila convert Ellassar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as far fetched to joyn with the Assyrians in this War, as the World had any at that time. The Septuagint do not change the word of Ellassar at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the Mountains where of the Ark did rest, so do they in this place retain the Hebrew word Ellassar, being doubtful to give it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himself remembreth other opinions far more probable than this of Pontus or Hellespont: yet he dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latin Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus a Græcian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellas in the border of Cœlesyria. And S. Hierom calleth Ellas the City of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cœlesyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was King: who formerly joyned with Ninus in all his Conquests, being of the same Family, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrews written Arioch: and afterward again Aretas: as in the Maccabes: the Kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending upon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his Army, and the Principal Commander under him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plain, that Arioch here spoken of, the Son of that Arioch confederate of Ninus, was no King of Pontus, nor of Scythia: Regions far removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded under Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria: according to Stephanus: though Pliny sets it between the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any Brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that House (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta or Aretas) had the Government of that Persian Province called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosor's time. But this Arioch here spoken of may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the Son of Arius, the confederate of Ninus: whose Sons held league as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West to Babylonia, and Chaldæa: and in amity with them from the beginning, and of their own House, and Blood: which D. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the four Kings.

THE fourth King by Abraham overthrown was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Calvin of runnagates without habitation: Pererius out of Strabo, finds that Galilæa was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely of Ægyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galilæam habitant, Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authority of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilæa was not peopled at this time as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoever they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty Kingdoms adjoyning to Phœnicia, and Palestina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamena, Chalcidice, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these do also joyn themselves to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chief of the 4. Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia : and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

LAstly, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provincial Governour of Babylonia, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Pererius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur, and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a King of Elam : those Kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldæa, Shinar, Babylonia, or Assyria : but never by Elam ; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale : for so Q. Curtius calleth the Garment which the Persian Kings ware on their heads.

Neither do I believe that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatness at the time of this Invasion, and my reasons are these : First, example and experience teach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, do not long last : Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to over-look what it self had brought forth. His Fortunes were violent, but not perpetual. For his Empire died at once with himself : all whose chief Commanders became Kings after him. Tamberlain conquered Asia and India with a storm-like and terrible success : but to prevalent fury God hath adjoined a short life : and whatsoever things Nature her self worketh in hast, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before him.

Ninus being the first whom the madness of boundless dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious over them : a Man violent, insolent, and cruel. Semiramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious, than her Paramour : enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings unexampled. But her Son having changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proved no less Feminine than she was Masculine. And as Wounds and Wrongs, by their continual smart, put the Patient in mind how to cure the one, and revenge the other : so those Kings adjoining (whose subjection, and calamities incident was but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleep, when the advantage was offered by such a Successour. For in Regno Babylonico hic parùm resplenduit, This King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdom. And likely it is that the necks of mortal Men having been never before galled with the yoke of foreign dominion, Nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of living in slavery : no long descent having as yet invested the Assyrian with a right : nor any other title being for him to be pretended than a strong hand ; the fooliſh and effeminate Son of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his Vassals, with a power less mastering, and a mind less industrious than his Father and Mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to Raign 42. years, and thereof the greatest part after he came to Mans estate : witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before Honour, and bodily pleasures before greatness, as he neither indeavoured to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what he could not without contentious peril enjoy.

These Considerations being joined to the Story of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinar was rather an inferiour to the King of Persia, than either his superiour or equal, make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained again to Babylonia.

For conclusion I will add these two arguments confirming the former : First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great travel upon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldæa to Charran, and then to Canaan a passage of 700. Miles, or little less, with Women, Children, and Carriages : the Countries through which he wandred were then setled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. year of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the Voice of God, took this great journey in hand : in which time of 23. years after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their Liberty and former Estates. For Semiramis Army of four millions, with her self utterly consumed in India, and all her Arms and Engins of War, at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunity even to the poorest Souls and weakest hearted Creatures of the World, to repurchase their former Liberty. Strab. l. 15.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the Son of Ninias, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and again subjected them : which needed not if they had not been revolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arioch recovered one part, so did Baleus or Balaneus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that he conquered from Ægypt to India : and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, a Conquerour and Triumpher, which undertakings had been no other than the effects of madness, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subjection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well think the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but feigned : but if we grant this re-conquest, then is it true that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torn asunder, according to that which hath been gathered out of Moses as before remembred.

§. XIII.

That it is not unprobable that the four Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves : and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came : which if it be so, we need not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

THE consent of all Writers, whose works have come to my perusal, agreeing as they do, that these 4. Kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and their fellows were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seem intituled : doth almost inforce us to think that the History

History must so be understood, as I have delivered. But if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those Lands, or if (as Hierom hath it) Chedorlaomer was King of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry Regions: then may we otherwise conceive of this History: removing thereby some difficulties which Men perhaps have been unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For as it had been a strange conjecture to think that Arioch was drawn to assist the Persian, against the Sodomite; as far as from Pontus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was known, and almost impossible that the Vale of Siddim should have been once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbability, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should pass through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldæa, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those five Towns, whose very names how they should come to his Ear, being disjoyned by so many great Nations of different Languages, a Wise-man could hardly conjecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia, together with the Babylonian himself, yea the Kingdom of Ellassar, and that of Tidal, so far off removed were become his dependants, what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorrha? and when he should have sought the Establishment of his new-gotten Empire, by rooting out the Posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) than to imploy the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five petty Towns, leaving Tyrus, and Sidon, and the great City of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far nearer unto him, unsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alledged against the first Conquest of the Vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: So are the objections to be made against his re-conquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly upon the Text it self. For first, what madness had it been in that small Province to Rebel against so powerful a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaim them: was it not more than madness in them, when his terrible Army approached, still to entertain hope of Evasion: Yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations between Euphrates, yea between themselves and the River of Indus? Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should find no greater wisedom, if he knowing the weakness of this people, had raised such a World of Men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces he might have subdued. For the perpetual inheritance of that little Country, was not sufficient to countervail one months charges of so huge an Army. How small then must his Valour have been, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few Prisoners, and the pillage of the Country, although he had broken their Army in the Field? Now the Scriptures do not of this invasion (supposed so great) make any fearful matter: but compose the two Armies, as equally matcht, saying they were four Kings against five: yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall find that Abraham slew all these Kings, of which great slaughter no History makes mention: Neither will the Raign of Ninias who lived four or five years longer, permit that he should have died so soon: neither would Histories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears that these four Kings, were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these Kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders every one of his own company, which he carried forth as a Colony, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the usual manner of those times. Gen. 14. 17.

Neither is it unprobable, that Chedorlaomer leading a Troop of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Country which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first Book of Thucydides, with the manner of Discoveries, Conquests and Plantations, in the infancy of Greece, or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa, and Spain, with almost as many Kings as several Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new Discoveries, Passages, and Conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceive, that it was neither unusual, for the Leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make Alliances to gether, and break them again, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a Conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seem the more likely, by the slothful quality of Ninias then Raigning in Assyria: whose unmanlike temper was such, as might well give occasion to such undertaking spirits, as wanted the imployments whereunto they were accustomed, in the Raign of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unregarded: whilst others more unworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the consent of the whole stream of Writers upon this place make this conjecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authority whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selves to the former conjecture, that Amraphel was Ninias: And that the power of his Ancestours being by his sloth decaied, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this do not satisfie, we may say that Amraphel was an Under-King or Satrape of Shinar, under Ninias: who may be supposed to have had his Imperial Seat in his Fathers City Ninive: and to have preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the City of his Mother, whom he hated as an Usurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any Mans Salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might erre: then can I think that the opinion, That these four Kings were Leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto add that Chedorlaomer seems rather called a Persian King, than King of Persia: and that Arioch (whose Kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria and Arabia) having been a Man of Action of being being a worthy Mans Son, was very well pleased to give passage and assistance to these Captains or petty Kings. These and such like things here to urge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is unworthy to have cost bestowed upon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to imploy any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he find any that shall seem better than these. But of what Countries or people soever these four were Kings, this expedition is the only publick Action that we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Story, and of his Sons, and of his Nephews Esau and Jacob, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, neither to stand upon things generally known to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath been elsewhere already spoken, nor to prevent our selves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembred, we pass them here in silence. And because in this Story of Abraham and his posterity, there is much mention of Ægypt: by which it appears that even in the time of Abraham, it was a setled and flourishing Kingdom, it will not be amiss in the next place to speak somewhat of the Antiquities, and first Kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the first Peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the deliverey of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A brief of the names and times of the first Kings of Ægypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

SOon after the Confusion at Babel (as it seems) Cham with many of his Issue and followers (having doubtless known the fertility of Ægypt before the Flood) came thither and took possession of the Country: in which they built many Cities: and began the Kingdom one hundred ninety one years after the Deluge. The ancient Governours of this Kingdom till such time as Israel departed Ægypt, are shewen in the Table following.

An. Mundi.	An. dil.
2269.	613.	Typhon } Hercules. }
2276.	620.	Orus.
2391.	735.	Sesostris the Great.
2424.	768.	Sesostris the Blind.
2438.	782.	Busiris or Orus the second
2476.	820.	Acenchere or Thermutis or Meris.
2488.	832.	Ratboris or Athoris.
2497.	841.	Cheneres drowned in the Red Sea.

The Table and especially the Chronology, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, because in such obscurity manifest and resistless truth cannot be found. For S. Augustin, a Man of exceeding great judgment, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the Books of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the Succession of the Ægytian Kings: which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, than whom doubtless they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Ægyptian Story, was the ambition of the Priests: who to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leasings: and recounted unto Strangers, the names of many Kings that never Reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appear anon. Sure it is that the magnificent Works and Royal Buildings in Ægypt, such as are never found but in States that have greatly flourished, witness that their Princes were of marvelous greatness: and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Ægyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Ægyptians, and publishing in their own name, such as pleased them best; have confirmed them, and as it were enforced them upon us, by their authority. A third and general cause of more than Ægyptian darkness in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by John Annius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned I may add mine) I think thus; That Annius having seen some fragments of those Writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true Histories, where approved Writers confirm him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to pass that the account of Authors, either in the Chronology or Genealogy of the Ægyptian Kings, runs three altogether different ways. The Christian Writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late Writers follow the Edition of Annius his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Ægyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's Reign in Ægypt began in the Year after the Flood 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most Controversie, the best means is by help of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether with the Histories of the Assyrians, Trojans, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is joyned by general consent, with the 43. year of Ninus: in which Abraham was born. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven years, under the twelve, which were called the greater Gods: So that all the years of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynast. indured fourteen years: the fourteenth 26: the fifteenth 37. These three last are said to have been under the three younger Gods. So the fifteen first Dynasties lasted 161. years. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath been mentioned, because Annius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reject the account upon this only reason, That Annius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as currant, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the summ of 161. years, which according to our account were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the summ of 352. years, which were between the Flood and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynasty, which was the beginning of Cham's Reign in Ægypt, was in the year 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of Mankind which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Anno à diluvio 131. In building the Tower were consumed forty years as Glycas recordeth: whose report I have elsewhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattle, and Substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogs, Forests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of Culture in one hundred and seventy one years had brought upon it) no reasonable Man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himself in Ægypy, we allow 20 years: and these summs being added together, to wit one hundred thirty one years after the Flood, before they arrived at Babel, 40. years for their stay there, and 20. for Cham's passage into Ægypt, and setling there, make up the summ of 191 years: at which time we said that Cham began his Reign in Ægypt, in the beginning of the first Dynasty. And to this summ of 191. years if we add the 161. years of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbred in common account, we shall fall right with the year of Abraham's birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto, omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to prove that these first Dynasties must needs have been very short, and not containing in the whole summ of their several times above 161. years: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Ægypt have been peopled as soon as Babel after the Flood: or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinks) must have been before the Flood. That the arrival at Babel was many years before the Plantation of Ægypt, after the Flood, enough hath been said to prove: and that the Dynasties were not before the Flood, the number of the long-liv'd Generations between Adam and the Flood, which was less than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or if we will think, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynasties, then may this have been as well after the Flood, as before: considering that the Sons of Noah did not in every Country erect such form of Policy, as had been used in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conducter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or inforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers Families of Kings, but rather Successions of Regents, oft-times many under one King.

THE short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not several Races of Kings, as the vaunting Ægyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitutions of decaied Antiquities, it is more easie to deny than to affirm. But this may be said, partly upon good circumstance, partly upon the surest proof, That it was the manner of the Ægyptian Kings, to put the Government of the Country into the hands of some trusty Councellor, only reserving the Soveraignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turk doth to the chief Visier. This is confirmed first by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are under Cham, and more than one under Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore have been successions, not of Kings, but rather of Councellors and Regents. Secondly, by custom of such Princes Borderers to Ægypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Abimilech the Philistim in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captain of his Host; though in taking Abraham's Wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleasure. Likewise of Abimilech the Son of Gideon it was said: Is not he the Son of Jerubbal? and Zebul is his Officer? Also Ishbosheth the Son of Saul, feared Abner the Captain of the Host. Yea, David himself hating Joab for his cruelty, did not punish him, in regard of his greatness, which was such, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite living then in Ægypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his own idleness and pleasure, to have laid the burthen of Government upon others; and upon jealousie, the companion of unworthiness, to have changed his Lieutenants often. Above all other proofs is the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joseph; Only in the Kings Throne will I be above thee: behold I have set thee over all the Land of Ægypt. William, Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred eighty, affirms that the like or very same form of Government by Viceroys, was in his time practised in Ægypt, having there been in use (as he believed) ever since the time of Joseph. He plainly shews, that the Soldans of Ægypt were not Lords of the Country, William Tyr. de bell. Sacro. l. 19. ca. 17, 18, 19, & 20.

Country, how ever they have been so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the duty of Subjects unto the Caliph: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not only of civil Government, but the power of making War and Peace, with the whole office and authority Royal into the Soldan's hands. He that shall read in William of Tyre, the Li. 19. 2c. State of the Caliph, or Mulene Elhadech, with the form of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Joseph was, though far inferiour in wisdom.

To think that many names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Joseph was, have crept into the list of the Ægyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Joseph's Brethren called him,
Gen 42.30 & 33. The Man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Country: Besides, it is not unlikely that the vain-glorious Ægyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant Men and strangers deem him such, under whose hand all dispatches of importance, and royal managing of the State had passed, whilst that the King himself intending his quiet, had given his office to another. How Strangers have mistaken in this kind, the example already cited of Joseph's brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests do appear in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, say; Diodorus, that Sesostris was the ninetieth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menas: which could not have been if Menas had been Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the Kings of so many sundry Lineages or sorts of Men. Now by whatsoever means a Dynasty or Regency continued: whether in one Family, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of Men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the Kings gift, and free choice, that gave the office. But the Crown royal always passed by descent, and not by election: which (beside consent of Authors) the Scriptures also prove. For whereas Joseph bought all the Land of Ægypt for Pharaoh, if the Crown had passed by election, then should Pharaoh's Children hereby either have been inthralled amongst the rest of the People, to the next Successour: or injoying their Fathers Land, though not his Estate, have been more mighty than the King: as Land-lords of all Ægypt, and the King himself their Tenant. Likewise we find in Exod. 12. that God smote the first-born of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his throne: And in Esay it Esa. 19. is said of Pharaoh, I am the Son of the ancient King.

§. IV.

Of Cham, and his Son Mizraim, or Osiris.

THat the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew.
Psal. 78. 51. 105. Ægypt is called in the Scripture, the Land of Ham.
23.27.106. 22. That this name is not given to it because the posterity of Cham did reign there, but for that himself did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I think it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Put, or Canaan, as well as Ægypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further Diod. Sic. l. 1. it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Osiris calleth himself the eldest Son of Cham, saying; Mihi pater Saturnus deorum omnium junior: also, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum: which must needs be understood of Cham: for this Saturnus Ægyptius was Cham: as it is said, that on the Monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Ægyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon not far from Ægypt doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts: And St. Hierome in quæstionibus Hebraicis, saith, that the Ægyptians themselves did in his daies call their Country Ham: as in four several places in the Psalms this Country is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Osiride, that in the Sacrifices of the Ægyptians this Country of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia: ut puto (saith he) a Chamo Noes filio, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Ægyptium usq; hodie Ægyptiorum lingua Kam vocari: that Ægypt unto this day in the tongue of the Ægyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Cham's reign, the same reasons may suffice to be alledged, which I have already given in proof of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither it is strange that the Reign of Cham, should last so long as 161. years: considering that Sem lived 600. Arpachshad and Shelah each above 400. But strange it had been, if one. Saitis created by Manetho, had in those long-lived generations reigned there, 19. years, and with Baon Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Osiris, Orus and Sesostris. Reineccius in histor. Julia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Osiris according to Diodorus: who saith he was the Son of Hammon: Krentzhemius saith that Mizraim, and Osiris are words of near affinity and sound in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Mizraim the Son of Cham, was Lord of Ægypt, and Reineccius citing good authority in this case, affirmeth that Ægypt is now called by the naturals in their own language Mezre. Neither do I see cause of doubt whether Osiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Osiris reigned. For whereas the year of his death is no where precisely set down, we must be fain to follow probabilities. That he is not vainly said by Annius his Berosus to have begun his Reign at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebæi began, it appeareth, first, by the authority of Eusebius: who avoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Osiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynast. I can well believe: assenting so far to Reineccius, who thinks the Dynasties were named only, according to the several seats of the Kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reign ended: and that Jacob came into Ægypt in the time of Orus the Son of Osiris.

THe death of Osiris, when it was, none can certainly affirm. The only conjecture that I know, is made thus. Lehabim the Son of Mizraim called Hercules Libyus, made war in Italy, to revenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. year of Baleus King of Assyria: before which year he had made many great Wars in Ægypt, Phœnicia, Phrygia, Crete, Libya, and Spain: and having ended his Ægyptian Wars, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus far Berosus, or authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the Gods (as they were stiled) held the Kingdom of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch as much; to which all old Histories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon infers, that six years may be allowed to the Wars, which Hercules made in so many Countries, after the Ægyptian Wars were ended: so should the death of Osiris have been the 34. of Baleus: when himself had Reigned 297. years. I think that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholar than Soldier. For surely in those days when Commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by Coasting, a far longer time would have been required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doubtless) to find the truth. If according to his account the death of Osiris had been the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel have come into Ægypt but seven years before the death of Osiris: and have lived there in the Reign of Typhon. A thing not easily believed. For it was the same King who advanced Joseph, bad him send for his Father, and gave him leave to go into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers Funeral: as may easily be gathered out of the Book of Genesis. Whereas therefore the Reign of Osiris, cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seventh year of Israel's coming into Ægypt: we must needs cut off 23. years from that number, which Krentzhemius conjectures his Reign to have continued: namely seven which he should have lived after Jacob's coming into Ægypt: nine in which Joseph had there flourished, ere his Fathers coming: and other seven in which Typhon and Hercules had Reigned after the death of Osiris, yet before Joseph's advancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Libyus his Wars. For the War which Hercules made in Italy, is said to have indured 10. years: After which proportion we may well give not only six years, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23. more to so many Wars in so many and so far-distant Countries, as are named before: Yea, by this proportion we may attribute unto Orus the 13. years, which passed between the time of Joseph's being sold into Ægypt, unto his advancement: considering that Putiphar who bought him, and whose Daughter he may seem to have married, continued all that while chief Steward unto Pharaoh: a thing not likely to have been, if so violent alterations had happened the whilst in Ægypt, as the tyrannous Usurpation of Typhon must needs have brought in. If citing some Fragment of a lost old Author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar for his faithfulness to Orus, the Son of Osiris, was by him in the beginning of his Reign made his chief Steward: at which time buying Joseph, and finding him a just man, and one under whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his Estate into Joseph's hands, than unto any of his Ægyptian followers (many of whom he had found either false-hearted, or weak and unlucky in the troublesome days of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further and say, That when the saying of Joseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his Servants: then Putiphar Priest of On, being chief Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Joseph, the ancient graces of God, and his injurious imprisonment; wherupon he gave him his Daughter to Wife: and being old resigned his Office of chief Steward unto him: who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did favour the Priests, when he bought the Lands of all other Ægyptians. This might appear to some a tale not unlike to the Frierly Book of Asenath, Putiphar's Daughter: but unto such as consider that God works usually by means: and that Putiphar was the Steward of that King, under whom Jacob died: it would seem a matter not unprobable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the Wars of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he should have spent 42. years after he left Ægypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian Wars considered, and his former enterprises and atchievements proportioned to them) doth not make against us, but for us: or if it were against us, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the undisputable truth of Scripture do confirm it. Nevertheless I freely grant that all these proofs are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules Ægyptius, Orus, and the two Sesostres, successively Reigning after Misraim: and of divers errors about the former Sesostres.

CConcerning the Reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giveth three years to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proof, as if his own word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable; alledging no witness, but as it were saying Teste meipso: yet herein we may think him to speak probably, forasmuch as the Learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soon undertake his Fathers revenge: and was not long in performing it: and that leaving Ægypt to his Brother, he followed other Wars, in the same quarrel, as hath been shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules Reigned after Typhon: yet seeing Aventinus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also believe it. That in the Reign of Typhon and Hercules, seven years were spent, howsoever divided between them, I gather out of Krentzhemius only, who placeth the beginning of Orus seven years after the death of Osiris: forgetting to set down his reasons, which in a matter so probable I think he wanted not. Now whereas he alloweth 90. years of the eighteenth Dynasty to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it seems that the Reign of Orus lasted 115 years. From the death of Orus to the departure of Israel out of Ægypt, there passed 122 years by our account: who (according to Beroaldus and others,) think that Abraham was born in the 130 year of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham ——— 352

From that time to the { Vocation of Abraham — 75 / departure out of Ægypt 430 which summ divers other ways may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Ægypt, there do remain (as is aforesaid) only 122 years from the death of Orus: we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed unto Sesostris or Sesonchosis: who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scholiastes Apollonii: not without good probability. For this great King or Conquerour, is by many Histories recorded to have over-run a great part of Asia: to have built a Fleet of Ships on the Red Sea: and so to have entred into India: likewise with an other Fleet on the middle-earth Seas, to have passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius judgeth) whom Justine erring in account of his time calleth Vexoris: For Juſtine placeth Vexoris in ages before Nimus: whereby it would follow that Seſoſtris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient than was Oſiris (otherwiſe Mizraim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is that after the departure of Iſrael out of Ægypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Ægypt into Aſia) till the Father-in-law of Salomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, took Gezar, and gave it to his Daughter: after which time Seſac oppreſſed Rehoboam, and gave it to his Daughter: after which time Seſac oppreſſed Rehoboam, and Necho ſought paſſage through the land of Iſrael, when he made his expedition againſt the Chaldæans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of queſtion, that neither of them was the great King Seſoſtris. Of Seſac it is doubted by ſome, foraſmuch as he came into Judæa, with a great Army. Reineccius propounding the doubt leaveth it undecided; unleſs it be ſufficient proof of his own opinion, that he himſelf placeth Seſoſtris next to Orus: following the Scholiaſtes Apollonii. But further anſwer may be made to ſhew that they were not one. For as Juſtine witneſſeth, Seſoſtris, otherwiſe Vexoris, made War on People far removed, abſtaining from his neighbours. Seſac came up purpoſely againſt Hieruſalem. Seſoſtris, as Diod. witneſſeth, had but 24000. horſe: Seſac had 60000: Seſoſtris had 8020. Chariots, Seſac but 1200: Seſoſtris made his expedition for no private purpoſe, but to get a great name: Seſac, as moſt agree, had no other purpoſe than to ſuccour Jeroboam, and give him countenance in his new reign: whom he had favoured even againſt Salomon: therefore Seſoſtris muſt needs have reigned whilſt Iſrael abode in Ægypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: becauſe thoſe Hiſtorians affirm that he reigned next after the Gods; it moveth me nothing. For Oſiris did ſucceed thoſe 15. Gods. namely the twelve greater and three leſſer: himſelf alſo (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being calleth Menas. Which name, as alſo Minæus, and Menis, were titles of dignity: though miſtaken by ſome as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Termaximus: the Hebrew word Meni ſignifying an Arithmetician: which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Oſiris: who was a great Conquerour, Philoſopher, and benefactor to mankind, by giving good Laws, and teaching profitable Arts. In proweſs and great undertakings Seſoſtris was no whit inferiour to Oſiris. For he ſought victory not for gain, but for honour only: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and ſubmitted themſelves to his will and royal diſpoſition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Ægypt. Soon upon his return he was endangered by a great Treaſon, the houſe in which he was, being by his own brother purpoſely fired: which nevertheleſs he is ſaid to have eſcaped, and to have reigned in all thirty three years: after which time he choſe rather to die than to live: becauſe he fell blind. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirm that Seſoſtris left a Son, whoſe name was Pheron or Pherones: who afterwards took the name of Seſoſtris: but was nothing like to his Father in glory: for he ſhortly fell blind. The cauſe of his blindneſs Herodotus attributes to his aſſaulting the River Nilus with a Javeline: which tale Diodorus having likewiſe heard, yet reports as a fable, ſaying that perhaps he took the diſeaſe naturally from his Father. How long this Man reigned it is no where expreſſed: yet forasmuch as Orus the ſecond, (otherwiſe Buſiris) who ſucceeded him, began 14. years after that this Seſoſtris had been King, it muſt needs be that this reigned 14. years at leaſt. That Buſiris began not until theſe 14. years at leaſt were expired, the very account of time from the firſt of Buſiris, to the departure of Iſrael out of Ægypt plainly ſhews, being almoſt generally agreed upon, to have been 75. years. That none came between Seſoſtris the ſecond and Buſiris or Orus the ſecond, it ſtands only upon probabilities: which are theſe. After Seſoſtris had raigned ſomewhile, he fell blind: after certain years he recovered his ſight, as is ſaid: which may have been true, but is more like to have been a fable: ſurely the manner of his recovery as it is ſet down, is very fabulous: namely that by looking upon a Woman, or waſhing his eyes with her water, who had only known her own Husband, he got his ſight again. As the time of his Reign, before his blindneſs, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14. years: ſo his works which were great, do much more ſtrongly argue, that his Reign was not very ſhort. His works are largely ſet down by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of which may ſeem to have been the finiſhing of that which his Father had begun, about the Channels and Sluces of Nilus: whom I think he rather frighted, (as his Father had done) with ſpades and ſhovels, than with darts, and javelins: and by his diligent overſight of that work, was like enough to loſe both his eyeſight and his peoples love: whom his Father had very buſily employed in exceſſive labour about it.

§. VII.

Of Buſiris the firſt oppreſſor of the Iſraelites: and of his ſucceſſor Queen Thermutis that took up Moſes out of the water.

AND herein (if I may preſume to conjecture) Buſiris, who was afterwards King, is like to have dealt with him, as Jeroboam did with the Son of Salomon. For that Buſiris himſelf was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared, by the drudgery wherewith he wearied the Children of Iſrael in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Seſoſtris, as Jeroboam was by Salomon in the overſight of thoſe buſineſſes, he had good opportunity to work his greatneſs with the King by induſtry: and afterward with the people by incenſing them againſt their new King: as Jeroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers: unleſs he have either an equal Spirit, or a ſurer foundation. If moreover he ſought to derive all the pain and labour of publick works from the Ægyptians, to the Iſraelites: he ſurely did that which to his own people was very plauſible, who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing ſlack in fulfilling the Kings cruelty. Now that Orus the 2. or Buſiris was the King that firſt oppreſſed Iſrael, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew Children, which (ſaith Cedrenus) laſted ten months: it is a common opinion of many great and moſt learned Writers, who alſo think that hereupon grew the fable of Buſiris ſacrificing ſtrangers. It is alſo a common interpretation of that place, Ex. 1, that the King, who knew not Joſeph, was a King of a new family. That Buſiris was of a new family, Reineccius doth ſhew: who alſo thinks him Author of the bloody Edict. Nevertheleſs, true it is, that Buſiris according to all mens computation, began his reign 5. years after Exod. 1.

the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began: which Bunting thinks to have lasted 87. years, ere the departure out of Ægypt. Let us therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesostris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Viceroys in Ægypt was: and how great confidence the Kings did put in them: seeing Joseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Ægypt, and all the Ægyptians for Bread; giving at the same time the best of the Land to his own Father and Brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Ægyptians cried out upon Pharaoh, for Bread: Pharaoh said to all the Ægyptians, Go to Joseph: what he saith to you, do ye. If to a Stranger born, lately fetcht out of Prison, a King well able to have governed himself, would give such Trust, and Soveraign Authority: it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a Man of especial Reputation. For God often prospers, not only the good (such as Joseph was) but wicked Men also, as his Instruments against the day of Wrath. Therefore perhaps the King did (as many have done) resign his Kingdom to him, though his Reign was not accounted to have begun, till the death of Sesostris. But whether Busiris did usurp the Kingdom, or protection of the Land by violence: or whether the blind King resigned it, keeping the Title: or whether Busiris were only Regent, whilst the King lived, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) King himself: it might well be said that Pharaoh's Daughter took up Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel: seeing he both at that time was King in effect, and shortly after King in deed and Title both. It were not absurd for us to say that the blind King Sesostris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seem that the wicked Tyrant shewed his evil Nature even when he first arose: I think it more likely, that Busiris did it, using at first the power of a King, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. years which passed between the beginning of Sesostris his Reign, and the departure of Israel out of Ægypt, 47. being spent: the 75. which remain, are to be accounted to Busiris or Orus the second, and his Children. Busiris himself reigned 30. years, according to Eusebius: whom very many judicious Authors herein approve. After him his Daughter, who took Moses out of the Water, is said by all that I have read, to have reigned 12. years: Her name was Thermutis Pharesis, or Muthis according to Cedrenus: Euseb. calls her Acencris: and out of Artabanus his History Meris: Josephus calls her both Acenchere, and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith that she was honoured afterward of the Ægyptians, by the name of Thermutis the Daughter of Amenoph, the Son of Pharaoh. Of this last Title question might be made and much spoken: For the Scriptures call her not Pharaoh's Sons Daughter, but Pharaoh's Daughter. Amenophis indeed is placed next before Busiris or Orus the second by Eusebius and others: But whether he were a King or only a Regent I cannot conjecture. For Herodotus; Diodorus, and the Ancient Historians name the Son of Sesostris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his Daughter by the Ægyptians called rather the Niece or Grandchild, than the Daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesostris, and the disreputation of his Son. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the Second marrying her, pretended any Title by her, then is our conjecture strengthened, and then was she both Daughter, Grandchild, and Wife unto Pharaoh: and surviving him, Queen of the Land, 12. years. But if she were the Daughter of Orus the second and Sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many think, to whose conjecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seem, that either her Brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two Brethren of Queen Thermutis: and what King it was, under whom Moses was born: and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

SHE had two Brethren: the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is only named by Eusebius: but his lineage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris after his Sisters death Reigned 9. years: after whom Chencres, thought to be his Son, Reigned 10. and then perished in the Red Sea. During the Reign of Chencres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Io: of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencres (whom some call Acencheres: but all or most do stile Στόμαχον a fighter against God) Acherres Reigned 8. years: and then Cherres 15. This descent seems from Father to Son. In the 11. year of Cherres it is said by Euseb. that Epaphus Reigning in the lower part of Ægypt built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not unlikely: viz. That Ægypt was greatly brought out of order by the Plagues which God had laid upon it, and the destruction of her King and Army in the Red Sea: else could it not have had two Reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his Posterity seems to have taken all from Cherres the Grandchild of Chencres. For whereas Armais is said to have Reigned 4. years after Cherres: and Armesis one after Armais: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one; and his Reign said to have been 5. years. His name is called Armeas, otherwise Danaus: and his Pedegree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Julia,

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Libya, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

T

Ægyptus or Rameſſes who gave name to the Country, having expelled his Brother Danaus, Reigned, and begat Lyncæus, Married to Hypermneſtra.

Danaus or Armeus expelled by his Brother Ægyptus, after he had Reigned five years, became King of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermneſtra.

How it might come to pass that the Nephews Sons of Epaphus should have occupied the Kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius to have been born in the time of Chencres. But forasmuch as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diversly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the Father of Danaus and Ægyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameſſes, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the Grandchild of Chencres.

And that the Posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the History of these two Brethren, Danaus and Ægyptus: of whom the former had 50. Daughters, the latter 50. Sons: perhaps, or rather questionless, by divers Women: yet surely they began to beget Children in their first youth: Howsoever it were, the general consent of Writers is, that Armeus or Danaus did succeed Cherres: and (according to Eusebius and good Authors approving him) reigned five years. Rameſſes followed, who reigned 68. years. This Rameſſes or Ægyptus is that Armeſeſmiamum or Armeſeſmiawus, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moſes was born: and the cruel Edict made of drowning the Hebrew Children. The length of his Reign seems to me the chief, if not the only ground of Mercator's opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moſes, Go return to Ægypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee, Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same King under whom Moſes was born, and under whom he slew the Ægyptian at the 40. year of his age: and fled into the Wilderness, and there abode for fear: all which Circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameſſes, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common Error, he placeth one Aliſfragmuthoſis (whose name is found in the List of Ægyptian Kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. years more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successors from Themoſis (whom Euſ. calls Amaſis) downwards with no other variation of the length of each Mans Reign, than is the difference between Manetho and Euſeb. he finds Moſes born under Armeſeſmiamum: and Iſrael delivered in the days of his Son Amenophis. The very name of Aliſfragmuthoſis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharatates, of which name one was thought to have flourished either as a King, or a wise Man about the time of Iſaac. For (saith he) from Aliſfragmuthoſis to Pharagmuthoſis, Pharmuthoſis, Pharetaſis, or Pharatates, the change is not great. Mercator was a Man of excellent learning and industry: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable works: yet my assent herein is with-held from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other Writers agree, that Chencres was the King who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be understood of Buſiris and all his Children, than of one King alone: Thirdly, S. Cyril in his first Book against Julian the Apoſtata, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moſes was 120. years old: Rameſſes, which was this Armeſeſmiamum, being then King of Ægypt. After Rameſſes, Amenophis reigned 19. years: who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laid open, I think it most expedient to refer the Kings ensuing to their own times (which a Chronological Table shall lay open) and here to speak of that great deliverance of Iſrael out of Ægypt: which for many great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly over-pass.

Exod. 4. 19.

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Ægypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses's birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Ægypt.

TRUE it is that the History it self is generally and well known: yet concerning the time of Moſes his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this, and other great works of the Highest, the different opinions are very near as many, as the Men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vives in his Annotations upon S. Auguſtine citeth many of their conjectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moſes lived in the time of Semiramis: but if he meant the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories Divine and humane; while that Semiramis lived she commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely: neither were the Ammonites or Moabites or Edomites while she ruled, in rerum natura.

A second opinion he remembreth of Appion, taken from Ptolomie a Priest of Mendes, who saith that Moſes was born while Inachus ruled the Argives, and Ameſis in Ægypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greek History the first Book: that Moſes was born while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Aſſyrius, who though he cite some Authorities, that Moſes lived after the Trojan War, is himself of opinion, that Moſes was far more ancient, proving it by many Arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth down the testimony of Numenius the Philosopher, who took Muſeus and Moſes to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moſes was called Muſeus, by the Gracians: and who farther delivereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the Daughter of Ægypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. Euſebius also affirmeth that by Eupolemus in his first Book De bono, Moſes vir Deo conjunctiſſimus is called Muſæus Judæorum. Euſebius in his Chronologie, finds that Moſes was born while Amenophis ruled Ægypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharaoh, which lived at Moſes's birth, Thumoſis or Thmoſis: the same perchance which Appion the Grammarian will have to be Amoſis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethoſis: to whom Lyſimachus and Cornelius Tacitus give the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemeth most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus or Ipherus, governed Aſſyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Criaſus the Argives; that then (Seſoſtris the second ruling in Ægypt) Moſes was born. For if we belive S. Auguſtine, it was about the end of Cecrops's time, that Moſes led Iſrael out of Ægypt. Eduxit Moſes ex Ægypto populum Dei noviſſimo tempore Cecropis Athenienſium regis:

Euſeb. de prepar. Evang. l. 9. c. 3.

Aug. l. 18. c. 11. de civit. Dei.

gis: Moses (saith he) led the People of God out of Ægypt, about the end of Cecrops's time King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses's birth, and of his departure out of Ægypt best proved. S. August. affirms (as before remembred) that Moses was born: Saphrus governing Assyria; and that he left Ægypt about the end of Cecrops's time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. years; his successor Mamelus 30. years; Sparetus after him 40. years: in whose fourth year Cecrops began to govern in Attica: Ascatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moses being born while Saphrus ruled Assyria; Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Criasus Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Ægypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth year of the Assyrian Saphrus: for take one year remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which add the thirty years of Mamelus, and the 40. years of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were wasted three years of Cecrops his 50. years: then take nine years out of the Reign of Ascatades, who was Sparetus's successor, those nine years added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Ægypt: and add these nine years to the three years of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remain but four years of Cecrops his 50. and so it falleth right with S. Augustine's words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the People of Israel out of Ægypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrews were oppressed in Ægypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eight or nine year before the birth of Moses, and 54. year, or rather more, after Joseph: between whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. years: some of which time, and 80. years after, they lived in great servitude and misery. Exod. 1. For as it is written in Exodus, They set taskmasters over them, to keep them under with burdens: and they built the Cities Pithom and Ramases, &c. And by cruelty they caused the children of Israel to serve; and made them weary of their lives, by sore labour in clay and brick, and in all work of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed: even from 54. years, or not much more after the death of Joseph, who left the World, when it had lasted 2370. years, to the eightieth year of Moses, and until he wrought his Miracles in the Field of Zoan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Ægypt, may the better be understood, I think it necessary to speak a few words of the principal places therein named, in this discourse.

§. II.

Of divers Cities and places in Ægypt, mentioned in this Story, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

Numb. 33. Ezek. 30. Hierem. 2. 43, 44, 46. Josep. l. 1. c. 9. Tyr. de bell. sacro l. 19. c. 23.

THIS City which the Hebrews call Zoan, was built seven years after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremie; the Septuagint, Tanis; Josephus Protarchis, after the name of an Ægyptian Queen; Antonius gives it the name of Thanis; Hegesippus Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapius. It adjoineth to the Land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremie the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Ægyptian and Jewish Idolatry.

Zoan or Taphnes was in Moses's time the Metropolis of the lower Ægypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not unlikely to be the same City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Artapanus affirmeth, that Abraham read Astronomie in Heliopolis or On, to Pharetates King of Ægypt, Alex. Polyhistor out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise: saying, that Abraham instructed the Ægyptian Priests, and not the King; both which Authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar Edition, for Zoan write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Junius, and our English call it On; and Ptolomie Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Ægypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Eastern-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelusium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the River Trajan, was the same which Vatablus, and our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge: the same which Pomp. Mela, and Pliny call Solis oppidum; Tyrius in the Holy War, Malbec; the Arabians Bahalbeth; and Simeon Sethi, fons Solis. Of this Heliopolis or On, was Putiphar Priest, or Prince, whose Daughter Joseph married. In the Territory adjoining Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Ægypt. In the confines of this City, Onias the high Priest of the Jews built a Temple, dedicated to the eternal God; not much inferiour to that of Jerusalem (Ptolomie Philopater then governing in Ægypt) which stood to the time of Vespasian, 333. years after the Foundation by Onias, whom Josephus falsely reporteth, herein to have fulfilled a Prophecie of Isai. c. 19. In die illa erit altare Domini in medio terræ Ægypti. In that day shall the altar of the Lord be in the midst of the land of Ægypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannising over the Jews, gave the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Ægypt. Lastly, there it was, that our Saviour Christ Jesus remained, while Joseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: near which (saith Brochard) the Fountain is still found, called Jesus Well, whose streams do afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Ægypt. And hereof see more in Brochard in his description of Ægypt.

Euseb. de præp. Evang. li. 9. c. 4. Gen. 12. 15. Isai. 19. 11. Ezek. 3. 17. Joseph. t. 1. bel. Judaic. c. 1. Broch. terr. sanct.

There is also the City of Noph, remembred by Isaiah and Ezekiel; the same which Hosea the Prophet calleth Moph: which latter name it took from a mountain adjoining, so called, which Mountain Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchahyr; and Tudalensis, Mizraim.

Isai. 19. 13. Ezek. 34. Hosea 9. 6. Lib. 2.

Pelusium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Junius, and our English write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus Lebna; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrius witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelusium was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrius) quæ olim dicta est Pelusium, Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium.

G. Tyr. l. 20. c. 17. lib. 2. c. 5.

The City of Noph, the Septuagint call Diospolis. Of which name there are two or three in Ægypt. Hierome converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Ezek. 30. 15, 16.

Bubastus, for so Hierome and Ziegler write it, is the same which the Hebrews call Pibeseth.

Ezek. 30. 17.

To make the Story the more perceivable, I have added a description of the Land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Heliopolis or Bethsemes, Balsephon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses's passage through the Desarts of Arabia the Stony. For all all Story without the knowledge of the places, wherein the Actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and understanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serve to retain, what we read, in our memories, so well as these Pictures and Descriptions do. In which respect I am driven to digress in many places, and to interpose some such Discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned Man Arias Montanus; who in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these words. Si enim absque locorum observatione res gestæ narrentur, aut sine Topographiæ cognitione Historiæ legantur, adeo confusa atque perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex iis nihil non obscurum, nihil non difficile elici possit. If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appear so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young Children in Ægypt: and of Moses his preservation, and education.

BUT to return to the Story it self. It appeareth that notwithstanding the Labour and Slavery, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: insomuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented Poverty, and the able Bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perilous they might be to his Estate, by suggestion of the Devil resolved to slaughter all the male Children of the Hebrews, so soon as they should be born. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thua, Women the most famous and expert amongst them, qua præerant (saith Commestor) multitudine obstetricum, who had command given them over all Midwives; by whom (as it seemeth) he gave order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to have called all the Midwives of Ægypt together, had been a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrews, or of the Ægyptians, it is diversly disputed. S. Augustin calls them Hebrews, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Ægypt commanded the Midwives of the Hebrew Women, &c. But Josephus, Abulensis, and Pererius believe them to be Ægyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret Murther, to the end the World might witness both the wickedness of the Ægyptians, and the just cause, thereby made manifest, of his future Indignation and Revenge: Pharaoh finding those Women filled with Piety, and the fear of God, commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publickly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew Children born within his Dominions.

Ver. 16.

Ver. 22.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greatest part of whom he might have assured, by affording them the justice, which every King oweth to his Vassals, and the rest he might have employed or sent away at his pleasure; Josephus giveth another cause, of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Ægyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be born a Child; who growing to Mans Estate should become a plague and terrour to his whole Nation. To prevent which, (and presuming that he could resist the Ordinance of God, by a name, contrary to the Laws of Heaven and of Nature) he stretched out his bloody and merciless Hand to the execution of his former intent. The same prevention Herod long after practised, when fearing the Spiritual Kingdom of Christ, as if it should have been Temporal, he caused all the Male Children at that time born to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kind of foreknowledge of the future success, it may be gathered by these his own words, in the tenth verse of the fifth of Exodus. Come, let us work wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to pass, that if there be War, they joyn themselves also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told it us from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdom of the worldly Men, when forgetting the Lord of all Power, they rely on the inventions of their own most feeble, and altogether darkned understanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved Daughter of this Tyrant, was that great Prophet and Minister of Gods marvellous works taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Ark of Reeds, a sucking and powerless Infant. And this Princess having beheld the Child his form and Beauty, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as she did not only preserve it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her own, and with equal care to the Son of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her Deed, she called the Child Moses, as it were, extractus, or ereptus, taken out, to wit, out of the Water: or after Josephus and Glycas, Moy, a voice expressing Water, and hises, as much to say, as that which is drawn out of water, or thence taken. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was Circumcised, before he was put into the Ark of Reeds, and that Amram, his Father, had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care and at the charge of Pharaoh's Daughter, and by Men of the most understanding taught and instructed: quem regio more educavit, præfectis ei sapientibus Ægyptiorum Magistris, à quibus erudiretur, saith Basil; Unto whom she gave Princely education, appointing over him wise Masters of the Ægyptians for his Instructers. Thereby (say Josephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Ægyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth. And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Ægyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Senensis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moses, and the Reign of Joshua.

Exo. 5. 10.

Strom. l. 1.

Phil. de vita Mos.

§. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Ægypt; and the opinions of certain ancient Historians of his War in Æthiopia; and of his Marriage there: Philo his judgement of his Pastoral life: and that of Pererius of the Books of Genesis and Job.

WHen Moses was grown to mans Estate, Josephus and Eusebius, out of Artapanus, tell us of ten years War that he made against the Æthiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyses called Meroe; and how he recovered covered that City by the favour of Tharbis, a Daughter of Æthiopia, whom he took to Wife. So hath Commestor a pretty tale of Moses, How after the end of that War, Tharbis resisting his return into Ægypt, Moses, most skilfull in Astronomy, caused two Images to be ingraven in two precious Stones: whereof the one encreased memory; the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two Rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his Wife Tharbis, reserving the other of memory for himself: which Ring of forgetfulness, after she had a while worn, she began to neglect the love she bare her Husband: and so Moses without danger returned into Ægypt. But leaving these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. year of Moses age, when he beheld an Ægyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrews, moved by compassion in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Ægyptian. Soon after which act, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whose chosen servant he was, he fled into Arabia Petræa, the next bordering Country to Ægypt; where wandering all alone, as a Man left and forsaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcileable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly means) to make the watering of a few sheep, and the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Madianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a Wife of one of those, and a Father-in-law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Country neerest Ægypt; fittest to return from: necessary to be known, because interjacent between Ægypt and Judæa, through which he was to lead the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best served. And lastly, where the glory of the World shined least, amidst mountainous Desarts, there the glory of God, which shineth most, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a Kings Son, or an adopted Child of great Pharaoh's Daughter, but as a meek and humble Shepherd, sitting at a Mountain foot; a keeper and commander of those poor Beasts only.

In that part of Arabia, near Madian, he consumed 40. years. And though (as Philo in the Story of Moses life observeth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary Desart enjoyed himself: and being separated from the press of the World, and the troublesome affairs thereof, he gave himself to contemplation, and to make perfect in himself all those knowledges, whereof his younger years had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also judging, that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (saith Philo) ars Pastoralis, quasi præludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quemadmodum bellicosa ingenia præexercent se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt; brutis præbentibus materiam exercitii, tam belli quàm pacis tempore. At verò præfectura mansueti pecoris habet quaddam simile cum regno in subditis; idcoq; Reges cognominantur Pastores populorum, non contumelia sed honoris gratia; The art of keeping Sheep is, as it were, an introductory exercise unto a Kingdom, namely, the rule over men, the most gentle flock: Even as warlike natures do beforehand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wild Beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in Warfare: those brute Beasts affording matter, wherein to train themselves, both in time of War and of Peace. But the government of gentle Cattel, hath a kind of resemblance unto a Kingly rule over Subjects; therefore, Kings are stiled Shepherds of the People, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Book of Job, as Pererius supposeth, I cannot judge of it, because it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius's opinion, That Moses, while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the books of Genesis; although I cannot deny the reason of Pererius's conjecture, That by the example of Job's patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrews: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of their delivery from the Ægyptian slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plenty promised. Perer. in 3. 6. Exod.

Of his calling back into Ægypt by the Angel of God, and the marvels and wonders which he performed, thereby to perswade Pharaoh, that he was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteen Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needless. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name he should make him known, and by whom he was sent; he received from God so much, as Man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being nature. Out of which he delivered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be understood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it self, but the Eternal: which truly is; which is above all; which is immutable. The bodies of Men are changed every moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment; never continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long, as while one may say Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in every shortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state. Exod. 6. 3. v. 12, 14, & 15. Una est Dei & sola natura, quæ verè est: id enim quod subsistit non habet aliundè, sed suum est. Cætera quæ creata sunt, etiamsi videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit; It is the one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himself, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seem to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not been, may again want being. Hieron. ad Dam.

And with this, in respect of the Divine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Totu rerum natura umbra est, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitful: in comparison of whom (saith Esay) all Nations are as nothing, less than nothing, and vanity.

Of the ten plagues wherewith the Ægyptians were strucken, the first was by changing the Rivers into Blood: God punishing them by those waters, into which their Forefathers had thrown, and in which they had drowned, the innocent Children of the Hebrews. To which this place of the Revelation may be fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the waters say, Lord, thou art just, which art, and which wast: and holy, because thou hast judged these things; for they shed the blood of the Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou given them blood to drink. C. 4. v. 13. C. 16. v. 5.

The

The rest of the Plagues by Frogs, Lice, Flies, or stinging Wasps; by the death of their Cattle; by leprous Scabs; by Hail and Fire; by Grashoppers; by darkness; after which Pharaoh forbad Moses his presence: moved the hardned heart of the unbelieving King no longer, than the pain and peril lasted, till such time as his own First-born, and the First-born of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his own life, (a time wherein we remember God perforce) stood upon no condition: whereas before, he first yielded but to the departure of the Men; then of the Men, Women, and Children, reserving their Bestial; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not only depart with all their own, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels of his own people: of which (the fear being past) he suddainly repented him, as his pursuit after them proved. For when every one of the Hebrews had (according to direction from Moses received) slain a Lamb, without spot or blemish, for the Passover, (a Sacrament of the most clean and unspotted Saviour) and with the Blood thereof coloured the Post and Lintern of the Doors; the Angel of God in the dead of the Night smote every first-born of Ægypt, from the Son of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slave: the Children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible Judgment of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yielded, as before is said, to their departure. The Ægyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with Blood, which the Israelites used after the Passover; ascribing an exceeding vertue to the red colour: and therefore they did not only mark their Sheep and Cattle, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preserve them from Lightning and other harms.

Epiphan. lib. 1. cont. Hæres.

§. V.

Of Pharaoh's pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the red Sea, so far as Succoth.

NOW, when the People were removed, and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) he bethought him as well of the honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoils of his People, and in despight of himself. And having before this time great Companies of Soldiers in readiness, he consulted with himself, what way the Israelites were like to take. He knew that the shortest and faireſt passage was through the Country of the Philistims. But because these People were very strong, and a war like Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to find some other outlet, to wit, through the Desart of Etham; and there, because the Country was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattle, he thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape him that way. In the mean while having gathered together all the Chariots of Ægypt, and 600. of his own, and Captains over them; he determined to set upon them in the Plains of Gosen, which way soever they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharp Hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Scythe. Which kind of Fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Britains used against the Romans, while they made the War for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh, Josephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted, but that Pharaoh intended long before to assail the Hebrews at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an Army, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things, either that the Hebrews might joyn themselves to his Enemies within the Land, or being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the Plagues which God grieved him withal, enforc'd him at this time to give an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Josephus partial in this affair, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Ægypt: which could not be done in hast. For Moses made but three days march, ere Pharaoh was at his Heels; and yet the last day he went on sixteen Miles: which, in so hot a Country, and to drive their Cattle and Sheep with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerful Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew, that he went out with a mighty Hand, and that God guided his Understanding in all his enterprises: so he lay not still in the ditch crying for help, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed, becoming a natural wise Man, a valiant and a skilful Conducter; as by all his Actions and Counsels from this day to his death well appeared.

Exod. 14. v. 7.

Jos. Ant. l. 2. c. 6.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after he had warned Israel of the Passover, he appointed a general Assembly or Rendesvous of all the Hebrews at Ramases, in the Territory of Gosen; a City standing indifferent to receive from all other parts of the Country the dispersed Hebrews: and gave commandment, that every Family should bring with them such store as they had, of Dough and Paste, not staying to make it into Bread: knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having considered the great strength of Pharaoh's Horse-men and Chariots, of which kind of defence Moses was utterly unprovided (though as it is written, the Israelites went up armed) he marched from Ramases Eastward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth; which he performed on the fifteenth day of the Month Abib. Which Month from that time forward they were commanded to account, as the first Month of the year. Whether in former times they had been accustomed to begin their year in some other Month, following the manner of the Ægyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their fore-fathers, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politick year, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some Solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in use. Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, unto the beginning, midst, or ending of the year; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politick year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of days in every Month, and the whole form of their year, like enough it is that Moses himself in forty years space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalendar, was made publick, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not find. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I think,

1. Aut. c. 4.

Ve Adar was an intercalary Month, added, ſome years, unto the other twelve, to make the Solary and Lunary year agree; which (beſides the general inconvenience that would otherwiſe have riſen, by caſting the Months of Summer into the Winter Seaſon, to the great confuſion of all account) was more neceſſarily to be regarded of the Hebrews, becauſe of the divine precept. For God appointed eſpecial Feaſts to be celebrated Deut. 16. preciſely in ſuch a Month of the year, and withal on a ſet day, both of the Moon and of the Month; as, the Feaſt of the firſt-fruits; the new Moons, and the like: which could not have ſo been kept, if either the day of the Moon had fallen in ſome other part of the Month, or the Month it ſelf been found far diſtant from his place in the ſeaſon of the year.

Other Nations, the better to obſerve their ſolemnities in the due time, and to aſcertain all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principal commodity of time, that is the meaſure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their years unequal, by adding ſometimes, and ſometimes abating one or more days, as the error committed in foregoing years required. The error grew at firſt, by not knowing what number of days made up a compleat year. For though by the continual courſe of the Sun, cauſing Summer and Winter duly to ſucceed each other, it is plain enough even to the moſt ſavage of all People, when a year hath paſſed over them; yet the neceſſity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbred by a ſhorter Tally, makes this long meaſure of whole years inſufficient for the ſmaller ſort of more daily affairs. Therefore Men obſerved the Monthly conſpicuous revolution of the Moon, by which they divided the year into twelve parts, ſubdividing the 30 & 29. Month into 29. days and nights, and thoſe again into their quarters and hours. But as the marks of time are ſenſible and eaſily diſcerned: ſo the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the underſtanding. Twelve revolutions of the Moon, containing leſs time by eleven days or thereabout, than the yearly courſe of the Sun, through the Zodiack, in the ſpace of ſixteen years, every Month was found in the quite contrary part of the year, to that wherein it was placed at the firſt. This cauſed them to add ſome days to the year, making it to conſiſt of twelve Months, and as many days more, as they thought would make the courſes of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errours. For neither did the Sun determine his yearly revolution by any ſet number of whole days; neither did the Moon change always at one hour; but the very minutes and leſſer fractions were to be obſerved by him, that would ſeek to reduce their motions (which motions alſo were not ſtill alike) into any certain rule. Here lay much wiſdom and deep art, which could not ſoon be brought to perfection. Yet as making an eſtimate at random, the Athenians held the year to contain 360. days, wherein moſt of the Greeks concurred with them. That 360. days filled up the Grecian year (beſid ſ many collateral proofs) it is manifeſt Plin. l. 34. by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling c. 6. of the Statues, erected in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, which were (ſaith he) 360. whilſt as yet the year exceeded not that number of days. By this account neither did any certain age of the Moon begin or end their Months; neither could their Months continue many years, in their own places: but muſt needs be ſhifted by little and little, from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the days forgotten, to be inſerted into the Almanack by Men, but not forgotten by the ſuperious bodies in their courſes, ſhould occupy their own rooms in their due turns. Now, becauſe the ſolemnity of the Olympian Games was to be held at the full Moon, and withal on the 13. day of the Month Hecatombæon (which anſwereth in a manner to our June) they were careful to take order, that this Month might ever begin with the new Moon; which they effected by adding ſome two days to the laſt Month of every year: thoſe Games being held once in four years. This intercalation ſufficed not to make the matter even; which cauſed them ſometimes to omit one day in the fourth year, which was the ſecond of the Month Bædromian; (agreeing nearly with our Auguſt) ſometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to inſert another for it into the fourth Lunary year, accounting by the Moon, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithſtanding their Month of June would every year have grown colder and colder, had they not ſought to keep all upright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eight year one whole Month, which they called the ſecond Poſideon, or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who alſo taught them to make one Month of 29. days, another of 30. and ſo ſucceſſively through the whole year. Thus with much labour they kept their year as near as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but theſe marks which they obſerved, were found at length to be deceitful Guides. For it was not poſſible ſo to faſhion this eighth years intercalation, that it ſhould not deceive them in 11. hours and 18. minutes at the leaſt, or ſome ways in 34. hours and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few ages, have bred much confuſion. The firſt that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth years intercalation, deviſed a Cycle of 19. years, wherein the Moon having 235. times run her circuit, met with the Sun in the ſame place, and on the ſame day of the year, as in the 19. year before paſt ſhe had done. This invention of Meton was entertained with great applauſe, and paſſing from Greece to Rome, was there inſerted into the Kalendar in golden letters, being called the golden number, which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoided the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had been used; for by the intercalation of 7. Months in the 19. years, all was so even, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that errour which in one year could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moons anticipating in one Cycle 7. hours, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus devised a new Cycle containing four of Metons, that is to say, 76. years; and afterwards Hipparchus, a noble Astrologer, framed another, containing four of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some errour in the former observations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Julius Cæsar made, who by advice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies, reduced the year unto the form which is now in use with us, containing 365. days and six hours, which hours, in four years make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth year, the 24. of February. The correction of the Julian year by Pope Gregory the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by general consent; it was indeed, but as a note added unto the work of Cæsar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was observed, that the Sun, which at the time of the Nicene Council, Anno Dom. 324. entred the Æquinoctial on the 21. day of March, was in the year 1582. ten days sooner found in that time, Pope Gregory struck out of the Kalendar ten days, following the fourth of October, so that in stead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which means the moveable Feasts depending on the Suns entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in every hundredth year, the Leap-day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred: because the Sun doth not in his yearly course take up full six hours above the 365. days; but faileth so many minutes, as in 400. years make about three whole days.

But the Cycle of 19. years, which the Hebrews used, was such as neither did need any nice curiosity of hours, minutes, and other lesser fractions to help it; neither did in summing up the days of the whole year, neglect the days of the Moon, confounding one Month with another. For with them it fell out so, that always the Kalends or first day of the Month was at the new Moon, and because that day was festival, they were very careful as well to observe the short year of the Moon, passing through all the 12. Signs in one Month, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First therefore they gave to Nisan their first Month, which is about our March or April, 30. days; to Jar their second Month 29. days; and so successively 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to pass, that every two Months of theirs contained somewhat evenly two revolutions of the Moon, allowing 29. days, 12 hours, and odd minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact days, which made up 7. Months in 19. years; to 6. of which 7. were commonly given 30 days; to one of them 29. days, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common year (as appeareth by the several days of each Month) contained 354. days, which fail of the year; wherein the Sun finisheth his course, 11. whole days, with some fractions of time. But these days, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle, of 19. years were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sun and Moon were found on the same day of the year, Month and Week, yea commonly on the same hour of the day, where they had been at the beginning of the 19. years before.

Divers have diversly set down the form of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their intercalations. Sigonius tells us, that every second year they did add a Month of 22. days; every fourth year a Month of 23. in the regard of 11. days and a half wanting in 12. Moons to fulfil a year of the Sun. But herein Sigonius was very much deceived. For the Moon doth never finish her course in 22. or 23. days: and therefore to have added so many days to the end of the year, had been the way to change the fashion of all the Months in the years following, which could not have begun as they ought, with the new Moon. Genebrard saith, that every third year, or second year, as need required, they did intercalate one Month, adding it at the years end unto the other 12. This I believe to have been true; but in which of the years the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) methinks they do not probably deliver, who keep all far from evenness until the very last of the 19. years. For (to omit such as err grosly) some there are who say, that after three years, when besides the days spent in 36. courses of the Moon, 33. days are left remaining, that is, 11. days of each year; then did the Hebrews add a Month of 30. days; keeping three days as it were in plusage unto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixth year; at which time, besides the intercalary Month, remained six days, namely three surmounting that Month, and the Epact of three years, besides the three formerly reserved. Thus they go on to the 18. year; at which time they have 18. days in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. year make up a Month of 29. days, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all even.

Sig. de rep. Hebr. l. 3. c. 1.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor deny; yet surely it must needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18. year every Month were removed from his own place by the distance of 48 days, that is, half a quarter of the year and more; which in convenience by such a reckoning was unavoidable. Wherefore, I prefer the common opinion, which preventeth such dislocation of the Months, by setting down a more convenient way of intercalation in the 8. year. For the 6. days remaining after the 2. former intercalations made in the 3d and 6th years, added unto the 22. days, arising out of the Epacts of the 7th and 8th years, do fitly serve to make up a Month, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year following; and this borrowing of two days is so far from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the years ensuing vary the less from the proper season of every Month. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew Months and Years, by which they guided their accompts.

neareſt. But being aſſured of the multitude of Horſemen and armed Chariots, that followed him, he kept himſelf from being incompaſſed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he reſted but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the diſtance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbare to enter Arabia being then in ſight thereof, it ſeemeth to proceed from three reſpects; the firſt two natural; the third divine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moſes took, perſwaded himſelf, that the numbers which Moſes led, conſiſting of above a Million, if not two Millions of Souls, (for as it is written Exod. the 12. Great multitudes of ſundry ſorts of people went out with them) could not poſſibly paſs over thoſe deſart and high Mountains with ſo great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that faſtneſs he ſhould have over-taken them, and deſtroyed the greateſt numbers of them. For theſe his own words. They are tangled in the Land, the Wilderneſs hath ſhut them in, do ſhew his hopes and intents; which Moſes by turning another way did fruſtrate. Secondly, Moſes by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the Eaſt ſide of the land of Goſen, or Rameſes: from whence (miſſing Moſes there) his purſuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reaſon of the roughneſs of the way; and howſoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the Mountain foot on the left hand, they were better ſecured from the over-bearing violence both of the Horſe and Chariots. Thirdly, Moſes's confidence in the all-powerful God was ſuch, by whoſe Spirit, only wiſe, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to almighty God, than either by an eſcape the next way, or by the ſtrength of his multitude, conſiſting of 600000. Men, to caſt the ſucceſs upon his own underſtanding, wiſe conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, 16. mile diſtant; and ſate down between two Ledges of Mountains adjoyning to the Red Sea; to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, and Balzephon towards the South: the ſame which Oſorius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there ſtood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And as Phagius noteth, the word ſo compounded, is as much to ſay, as Dominus ſpecula, ſive cuſtodia, Lord of the watch-tower. For the Ægyptians believed, or at leaſt made their Slaves believe, that if any of them offered to eſcape that way into Arabia, this Idol would both arreſt them, and force them to return to their Lords and Maſters. For the Ægyptians had Gods for all turns. Ægyptii Diis fœcundi; The Ægyptians were fruitful in Gods, ſaith St. Hierome. But Moſes who incamped at the foot of this Mountain with a million of Souls, or as others conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-tower aſleep, or out of countenance.

It is probable that all thoſe Ægyptians & others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledg of the true God, followed Moſes at his departure.

Climax is rather ſo called in reſpect of a paſſage up and down, than that it is any proper name.

Now theſe two paſſages leading out of Ægypt into Arabia upon the firm land Moſes refuſed, as Exod. 13. v. 17. well that of Peluſium and Caſtotis, the faireſt and ſhorteſt of all other, in reſpect of Judea, as the other by Etham; from which he reflected, for the reaſons before remembred, and took the way by the valley of Pihacheroth, between the Mountains, which made a ſtraight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made ſo great ſpeed with his horſemen and chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to reſt them after ſo long a march; but gat ſight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and waſh of the Sea: inſomuch as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaoh's ſudden approach, began to deſpair, and to mutine, at that time when it behoved them moſt to have taken courage for their own defence; laying it to Moſes's charge, that themſelves foreſaw thoſe perils in which they were wrapped. And fear, which, ſaith the book of Wiſdom, is the betraying of thoſe ſuccours which reaſon offereth, made them both deſpair in Gods former promiſes, and to be forgetful of their own ſtrength and multitudes. c. 17. 11.

§. VIII.

Of their paſſage over the Red Sea: and of the Red Sea it ſelf.

BUt Moſes who feared nothing but God himſelf, perſwaded them to be confident in his goodneſs, who hath never abandoned thoſe, that aſſuredly truſt in him; uſing this comfortable and reſolved ſpeech: Fear not, &c. for the Ægyptians whom you have ſeen this day, ye ſhall never ſee them again. The Lord ſhall fight for you. After which Moſes called on God for ſuccour, received encouragement, and commandment to go on, in theſe Words. Wherefore crieſt thou unto me? ſpeak unto the Children of Iſrael that they go forward; and lift thou up thy rod, and ſtretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it, and let the Children of Iſrael go on dry ground through the midſt of the Sea. Moſes obeying the voice of God, in the dark of the night finding the Sands uncovered, paſt on towards the other ſide and Coaſt of Arabia: two parts of the night being ſpent ere he entred the Ford, which it pleaſed God by a forcible Eaſtern wind, and by Moſes's Rod to prepare. Exod. 14. v. 13. Exod. 14. v. 16.

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the ſame dry ground which Moſes trod on. Therefore, as it is written, The Angel of God which went before the Hoſt of Iſrael, removed, and went behind them: alſo the pillar of the Cloud went from before them, and ſtood behind them; which is, that it pleaſed God therein either by his immediate power, or by the miniſtery of his Angel, to interpoſe his defence between the Hebrews and their Enemies; to the end that the Ægyptians might hereby be blinded, in ſuch ſort, as they could not purſue Iſrael with any harmful ſpeed. But in the morning watch Moſes ſeiſed the other bank of Arabia ſide: and Pharaoh (as the dawn of day began to illighten the obſcure air) finding a beginning of the Seas return, haſted himſelf towards his own Coaſt: But Moſes ſtretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is; the Sea moved by the power of God, ran back towards the land with unreſiſtable fury and ſwiftneſs, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, ſo as not one eſcaped. For it is written, that God took off their Chariot-wheels, that is, when the waters began to cover the ſands, the Ægyptians being ſtrucken with fear of death, ran one athwart another, and miſſing the path by which they had paſt on after the Hebrews, their wheels ſtuck faſt in the Mud and Quick-ſands, and could not be drawn out: the Sea coming againſt them with ſupernatural violence. Joſhua 24. v. 7. Exod. 14. v. 27.

Lyranus upon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moſes had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the Children of Iſrael were fearful to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Juda firſt made the adventure, and that therefore was that Tribe ever after honoured above the reſt, according to the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers Sons ſhall bow down unto thee. But Hierome upon the 11. of Hoſea condemns this opinion. And though it be true, that Juda had the firſt place in all their marches in the Deſart, and, as we now call it, led the Vanguard; (whereupon it may be inferred, that he alſo led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moſes himſelf was the conducter of Iſrael at that time, it is generally received. For, as it is written in the 77. Pſalm: Thou didſt lead thy people like Sheep by the hand of Moſes and Aaron.

The Hebrews have alſo another fancy, that the Red Sea was divided into 12. parts, and that every Tribe paſt over in a path apart, becauſe it is written in the 135. Pſalm, according to the Vulgar, Diviſit mare rubrum in diviſiones; He divided the Red Sea in diviſions. Alſo that the bottom of the Sea became as a green Field or Paſture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulenſis, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to conſider, that there were not 12. pillars nor 12. Armies of the Ægyptians. It is written in the 77. Pſalm; v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea; not thy ways; and in the laſt of the book of Wiſdom, verſ. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moſes paſt, and in which Pharaoh, otherwiſe called Chencres, periſhed in the 16. year of his Raign, is commonly known by the name of the Red Sea; though the ſame differ nothing at all in natural colour from other waters. But as Philoſtratus in his third Book noteth, and our ſelves know by experience, it is of a bluiſh colour, as other Seas are. It entreth at a narrow ſtrait between Arabia the Happy and Æthiopia, or the land of the Abyſſins: the Mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolomy calleth Poſodium, to the other land of Æthiopia, hath not above ſix Leagues in breadth: and the ſame alſo filled every where with Iſlands, but afterwards it extendeth it ſelf 58. Leagues from Coaſt to Coaſt: and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petræa, on one ſide, and Æthiopia, and Ægypt on the other, as far as Sues, the uttermoſt end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turk now keepeth his Fleet of Gallies. The Coſmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian Gulf: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moſes paſt, is called Heropolites of the City Hero, ſometime Troy: and of later times Sues.

Plin. l. 6. c. 29. Pliny calls it Cambiſu, by which name it was known, ſaith he, before it was called Hero many years. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North, Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Æleniticum: King Juba Læniticum: others more

3. K. 9. properly Elaniticum, of the Port and City Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolomy Elana:

Joſ. Ant. 8. c. 2. Pliny Lana: Joſephus Ilana, and Marius Niger Aila: there is alſo Ilalah in Aſſyria, to which Salamanaſſer carried the Iſraelites captive, 2 Kings c. 8. 11. which Ilalah in Aſſyria, the Septuagint call Elaa: and in the firſt of Chron. the 5. Ala. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diverſly named, the Moors and Arabians (Vaſſals to the Turk) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulf of Meca, after the name of Mahomet's Town Mecca. The Greeks write it the Sea Erythræum: of a King called Erythras, or Erythræus: and becauſe Erythros in the Greek ſignifieth red, hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythræus, the Son of Perſeus and Andromeda, yet it took the name of the Red Sea, as Arian. de geſt. Alex. mag. l. 8. Strabo. l. 6. Quin. Curtius conjecture th: which Arianus and Strabo confirm. But it ſeemeth to me by the view of a diſcovery of that Sea in the year 1544. performed by Steven Gama, Viceroy of the Eaſt India for the King of Portugal, that this Sea was ſo called from a reflection of redneſs, both from the Banks, Clifts, and Sands of many Iſlands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I find by the report of Caſtro, a principal Commander under Gama (which diſcourſe I gave Mr. Richard Hacluit to publiſh) that there is an Iſland called Dalaqua, ſometime Leques, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth, the Earth, Sands, and Clifts, of which Iſland, being of a reddiſh colour, ſerve for a Foil to the waters about it; and make it ſeem altogether of the ſame colour. Secondly, the ſame Caſtro reporteth, that from 24. Degrees of Septentrional Latitude, to 27 (which make in length of coaſt 180. Mile, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the Clifts and Banks are of red earth, or ſtone, which by reflection of the Sun-beams, give a kind of reddiſh luſter to the waters. Thirdly, thoſe Portugals report, and we know it by many teſtimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea towards the Shore, great abundance of Red Stones, on which the greateſt ſtore of Corral grows, which is carried into moſt parts of Europe, and elſewhere. There are alſo on the Iſlands of this Sea many red Trees, ſaith Strabo, and thoſe growing under water, may alſo be a cauſe of ſuch a colour. Of theſe appearances of redneſs by the ſhadows of theſe Stones, Sands, Earth, and Clifts, I ſuppoſe that it firſt took the name of the Red Sea, becauſe in ſo many places it ſeemeth to be ſuch: which Johannes Barros in his ſecond Decade, eight Book, and firſt Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana, or Ezion Gaber adjoyning, now Toro, called by the ancient Coſmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which waſheth the Banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16. or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, ſome three Leagues or nine Engliſh M.le over, and from this Port of Toro, to Sues, and the end of this Sea, it is in length about 28. leagues, of which the firſt 26. have nine Mile breadth as aforeſaid, and afterward the lands both from Ægypt and Arabia, thruſt themſelves into the Sea, and ſtraiten it ſo faſt, as for ſix Miles together it is not above three Mile over; from thence upward the land on Ægypt ſide, falleth away, and makes a kind of Bay or Cove for ſome ten Miles together, after which the land grows upon the Sea again, and ſo binds it into the very end thereof, at four Miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moſes paſt it over, though others would have it to be over againſt Elana or Toro; but without judgment: for from Ramaſes to Pihacheroth and Balzephon, there is not above 30. Miles interjacent, or 35. Miles at moſt, which Moſes paſt over in three days: and between the land of Ægypt oppoſite to Elana or Toro, the diſtance is above 80. Miles. For Ramaſes to which City Moſes came (being the Metropolis of Goſen) when he left Pharaoh at Zoan, and took his laſt leave, ſtandeth in 30. Degrees five Minutes of Septentrional Latitude: and Migdol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountain Climax, or Baalſephon, in nine and twenty and a half, which made a difference of five and thirty Engliſh Mile: the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebb.

THE Ægyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrews have objected that Moses past over the red Sea at a low Ebb, upon a great spring-tide, and that Pharaoh conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recover the Coast of Ægypt, he was overtaken by the Flood, and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plain, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this Miracle by an Easterly Wind, and by the Hand and Rod of Moses (which Authority to Men that believe not therein perswadeth nothing) I say that by the same natural reason unto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there been no other working power from above, or assistance given from God himself to Moses, and the Children of Israel than ordinary and casual, then could not Pharaoh and all his Army have perished in that pursuit.

For whersoever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulf, or indraught, there do the Waters fall away from the Land: and run downward towards the Ocean: leaving all that part towards the Land as far as the Sea can ebb, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entring the Sea at Migdol under Baalzephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the Tide) must have left all that end of the red Sea towards Sues, on his left Hand dry and uncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the Water, ten or twelve Mile farther into the Sea than Sues, much more was it made at Sues, and between it and where Moses past: who entred the same so far below it, and towards the body of the same Sea. It followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve or Strait, had been by the Ebb of a spring-tide discovered, when Pharaoh found the Flood increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Ægypt side, but might have gone on in his return before the Tide, on his right Hand: and so taken ground again at the end of that Sea, at Sues it self, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures do truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth; but that Moses past on between two Seas; and that the Waters were divided. Otherwise, Pharaoh by any return of Waters could not have perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, prove the cause to have been a power above nature, and the miraculous work of God himself. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to run back by a strong east-wind, do rather prove the Miracle, than that thereby was caused an Ebb more than ordinary: for that Sea doth not lie East and West, but, in effect, North and South. And it must have been a West and North-west Wind, that must have driven those Waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East-wind blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell back towards the South, and main body thereof: the other part remained towards Sues, and the North. Which being unknown to Pharaoh; while he was checkt by that Sea, which used in all times before to ebb away: the Flood prest him and overwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Josephus avoweth, that Moses was not only of excellent Judgment generally, but also so great a Captain, as he overthrew the Æthiopians in many Battles, being imployed by Pharaoh, and won divers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grosness, and distraction: that rather than he would have endured the hardness of a mountainous passage at hand, (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharaoh) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing Water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the People, beholding Pharaoh's approach, cried out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safety: and when Moses prayed unto God for help, he was answered by God: Wherefore cryest thou unto me? speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at the time of Pharaoh's approach any Ebb at all; but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of Waters, by a strong East-wind, whereby the Sands discovered themselves between the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the Waters moved not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the Waters so defended them on both sides, as the Ægyptians could only follow them in the same path; not that the Waters stood upright as Walls do, as some of the Schoolmen have fansied. For had Pharaoh and the Ægyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soon have quitted the chace and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no Man of Judgment, that can think, that Pharaoh and the Ægyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the observations of Heavenly motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes, and refluxes of the Sea, in his own Country, on his own Coast, and in his own most traded and frequented Ports and Havens, and wherein, his People having had so many hundreds of years experience of the Tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknown or natural accident, but by Gods powerful Hand only; which then falleth most heavily on all Men, when looking through no other Spectacle but their own prosperity, they least discern it coming, and least fear it. Lastly, if the Army of the Ægyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary return of the Flood, before they could recover their own Coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the Flood which runneth up to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not have been cast ashore on that Coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, upon the Sea-bank over against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead Bodies; and not at the end of the red Sea, to which place the ordinary Flood would have carried them: which Flood doth not any where cross the Channel, and run athwart it, as it must have done from Ægypt side to Arabia, to have cast the Ægyptians Bodies there; but it keeps the natural course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their Carcases should have been carried, if the work had not been supernatural and miraculous. Apollonius in the Lives of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Ægyptians which staied in the Country, and did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honour those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were busied at the time of

C. 14. v. 22.

Pharaoh's

Pharaoh's destruction: as he that was then labouring in his Garden made a God of that Plant or Root, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those Multitudes of Gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given elsewhere. Orosius in his first Book and tenth Chapter against the Pagans tells us, that in his time, who lived some 400. years after Christ, the prints of Pharaoh's Chariot Wheels were to be seen at a low Water on the Ægyptian Sands: and though they were some time defaced by Wind and Weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But hereof I leave every Man to his own belief.

CHAP. IV.

Of the journying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them: with a Discourse of Laws.

§. I.

A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the Story, until the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BUT to go on with the Story of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was born in the year of the World 2434. Saphrus then governing Assyria; Orthopolis Sycionia, or Peloponnesus; Crisosus the Argives; Orus Ægypt; and Deucalion Thessalie. He fled into Midian when he had lived 40. years, in the year of the World 2474, and two years after was Caleb born. He returned by the Commandment and Ordinance of God into Ægypt, and wrought his Miracles in the Fields of Zoan, in the year 2514. in the last Month of that year. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew Month Abib, or the 15. of that Month, beginning the day (as they) at Sun setting, in the year of the World 2514. was the Celebration of the Passover: and in the dead of the Night of the same Day were all the first-born slain through Ægypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrews inhabited not. The 15. Day of the first Month, of the Hebrews called Abib, being about the beginning of the year of the World 2514. Moses with the Children of Israel removed from the general Assembly at Ramases, and marched to Succoth.

Acts 7. Josua 14. 2474. 2514. Pag. 254. Exod. 12. Num. 33.

And departing thence they made their third Station at Etham: and journying from Etham they incamped in the valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, under the Mountain Baalzephon; and in the same Night after mid-night, they past the red Sea: Pharaoh and his Army perishing in their return, about the first dawn of the Day. Moses having recovered the Banks of Arabia, gave Thanks unto God, for the delivery of Israel; and making no stay on that Coast, entred the Desarts of Arabia Petræa, called Sur. But finding no Water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desart of Etham, which in Exod. 15. v. 22. is also called Sur, 25. Miles from the Sea: where the Children of Israel prest with extreme Thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first at Pharaoh's approach in Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the Branches of a Tree, growing near a Lake of bitter Water, and casting the same thereinto, made the same sweet: a plain Type and Figure of our Saviour; who upon the Tree of the Cross changed the bitterness of everlasting Death into the sweetness of eternal Life. Pliny remembers these bitter Fountains in his sixth Book and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Ægypt, Sesostris first, Darius after him, and lastly Ptolomy the second, began to cut an Artificial River, thereby by Boats and small Shipping to Trade and Navigate the red Sea, from the great Cities upon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight Miles: where finding twelve Fountains of sweet Water, and 70. Palm-trees, he rested divers days.

Exod. 13. Num. 33. Exod. 14. Num. 33. Exod. 14. Num. 33. Exod. 15. Num. 33. Exod. 15. Num. 33.

Whether this Helim were the name of a Town or City in Moses's time, I cannot affirm. And yet the scarcity of Waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which had twelve Fountains, could hardly be left unpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his History of the Holy War, found at Helim the ruins of a great and ancient City. And at such time as Baldwin the first past that way into Ægypt, Ingressus (saith he) Helim, Civitatem antiquissimam populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum pervenisset, loci illius incolæ, Regis adventu præcognito, naviculam ingredientes in mare vicinum se contulerunt; Entring Helim a very ancient City, well known sometime to the People of Israel; whither, when he came, the Inhabitants, fore-warned of the Kings approach, took Boat, and shifted themselves into the Sea, lying near them. From Elim he returned again towards the South, and sate down by the Banks of the red Sea: the seventh Mansion. For it seemeth that he had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrews, appointed to bear Arms: nor assured the minds of the rest, who encountring with the least misery, were more apt to return to their quiet slavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which every where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to undertake or sustain so dangerous an Enemy: he therefore made stay at this Mansion, until the fifteenth of the second Month called Zim, or Ijar: and made the eight Mansion in the Desart of Zin; where the Children of Israel mutinied against Moses the third time, having want of Food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the red Sea, but in the Collection of every several incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set down.

Will. Tyr. l. 11. cap. 19. Exod. 17. Exod. 16.

Here it pleased God to send so many flights of Quails, as all the Country about their incamping was covered with them. The Morning following it also rained Manna, being the sixteenth of their Month, which served them instead of Bread. For now was the store consumed which the People carried with them out of Ægypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattle and Sheep among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feed themselves with many of those: but reserved them both for the Milk to relieve the Children withal, and for breed to store themselves when they came to the Land promised. Exod. 16.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two removes of twenty Mile: the one to Daphea, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim six Miles. Here being being again preſt with want of Water they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themſelves to be fed and beaten after the manner of Beaſts, than to ſuffer a caſual and ſometime neceſſary want, and to undergo the hazzards and travels which every manly mind ſeeketh after, for the love of God and their own freedoms. But Moſes with the ſame Rod which he divided the Sea withal, in the ſight of the Elders of Iſrael, brought Waters out of the Rock, wherewith the whole Multitude were ſatisfied. Exod. 17.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occaſion of the Battle with the Amalekites, and Jethro coming: who being a Kenite, was Prieſt of Madian.

AND while Moſes incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and gueſſed that he meant to lead the Children of Iſrael through their Country (which being barren of it ſelf, would be utterly waſted by ſo great a Multitude of People and Cattle) thought it moſt for their advantage to ſet upon them at Raphidim: where the want of Water, and all other things needful for the life of Man infeebled them. On the other ſide Moſes perceiving their reſolutions, Exod. 17. gave charge to Joſhua, to draw out a ſufficient number of the ableſt Hebrews, to incounter Amalech. Between whom and Iſrael, the Victory remained doubtful, for the moſt part of the day: the Hebrews and Amalekites contending with equal hopes and repulſes for many hours. And had not the ſtrength of Moſes's Prayers to God been of far greater force, and more prevalent, than all reſiſtance and attempt made by the Bodies of Men, that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly indangered the whole enterpriſe. For thoſe Bodies which are unacquainted with ſcarcity of Food, and thoſe minds whom a ſervile education hath dulled, being beaten, and deſpaired in their firſt attempts, will hardly, or never be brought again to hazzard themſelves.

After this Victory Jethro repaired to Moſes, bringing with him Moſes his Wife, and his two Sons, which either Jethro forbare to conduct, or Moſes to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalech the better aſſured himſelf of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exodus, v. 1. When Jethro the Prieſt of Midian, Moſes's Father in law, heard all that God had done for Moſes, &c. of which, the laſt deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalech, gave Jethro courage and aſſurance, he then repaired to his Son-in-law Moſes, at Sinai; where amongſt other things, he adviſed Moſes to appoint Judges, and other Officers, over Iſrael; being himſelf unable to give order in all Cauſes and Controverſies, among ſo many thouſands of People, full of diſcontentment and private controverſie.

This Jethro, although he dwelt amongſt the Midianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges, v. 11. & 17. it is made manifeſt; where it is written. Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the Son of Jethro, the father-in-law of Moſes, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his tents unto the plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kedeſh. Likewiſe in the firſt of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, leſt he ſhould deſtroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the Mountains of Sin Kadeſh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plains, according to the ſaying of Balaam, ſpeaking of the Kenites. Strong is thy dwelling-place, and thou haſt put thy neſt in the Rock. And that Saul ſpared this Nation, he giveth for cauſe, that they ſhewed mercy to all the Children of Iſrael, when they came up from Egypt. For theſe Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the iſſues of Madian, one of the ſix Sons which Abraham begat on Ketura; and might alſo take that name of Kenites from Ketura, of whom they deſcended by the Mother, who as it ſeemeth kept the knowledge of the True God among them, which they received from their Parent Abraham. For Moſes, when he fled out of Egypt into Midian, and married the Daughter of Jethro, would not (had he found them Idolaters) have made Jethro's Daughter the Mother of his Children. And although the Kenites are named amongſt thoſe Nations, which God promiſed, that the Seed of Abraham ſhould root out, and inherit their Lands; yet it cannot be meant by theſe, who are deſcended from Abraham himſelf: but by ſome other Nation, bearing the ſame name, and in all likelihood of the Race of Cain. For in the fifteenth of Gen. ver. nineteenth, theſe Kenites or Chuſites are liſted with the Hittites and Perizites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergeſites, and Jebuſites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But theſe Kenites, deſcended from Abraham, had Gen. 15. ſeparated themſelves from among the reſt, which were altogether Idolatrous. For, as is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the Children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to ſay, from thoſe Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedeſh or Kadeſh. Again, Moſes nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other Sons were born: which he did (referring my ſelf to better Judgment) rather, becauſe they were more ancient, than by anticipation. Judg. 4.

And as of the Kenites, ſo we may conſider of the Madianites, parted by Moſes into five Tribes. For ſome of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as thoſe of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards deſtroyed by Moſes. But the Madianites near the Banks of the red Sea, where Moſes married his Wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his Children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, ſeem likewiſe not to have been corrupted. For theſe Madianites with the Kenites aſſiſted Iſrael, and guided them in the Deſarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petræa, were by Iſrael rooted out, when thoſe adjoyning to the red Sea were not touched. Gen. 25. 4.

And though it may be doubted, whether thoſe of Madian, of whom Jethro was Prieſt, and the other Cities in Moab were the ſame, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moſes would not have ſent 12000. Iſraelites, as far back as the red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have deſtroyed that Madian, where his Wives Kindred inhabited: ſeeing himſelf coming with 600000. able Men, was encountred by Amalech, in that paſſage. Neither could Moſes forget the length of the way through thoſe diſcomfortable Deſarts, wherein himſelf and Iſrael had wandred 40. year.

That Jethro or Jothor, Raguel or Revel, and Hobab, were but one Perſon, the Scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel; and our Engliſh Revel; Exod. 2, 18. calls him Jethro, or Jothor, Exod. 3. & v. 1. c. 4. v. 18. & c. 18. 1. & 6. 9, 10, & 12. and in Numbers c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Jethro and Hobab to be the ſame, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given: with divers commendations of the invention of Laws.

THE reſt of the months of this year 2515. were ſpent in the Deſart of Sinai, near the Mountain of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Manſion. Euſebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were diſtinct Mountains: Hieromes to be but one, of a double name. And ſo it appeareth by many Scriptures. For in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 16. it is written Sinai. In the 100. Pſalm, v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And ſo it is called Galatians 4. 24. and again, Deut. 4. 10. & 15. & Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And ſo is it in the firſt of Kings 8. 6. and the 2d. of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Eccleſiaſticus the 48. 7. they are named as one. Which heardſt (ſaith Eccleſiaſticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgment of the vengeance. Somewhat they are diſjoyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius: who in the year 1588. paſt out of Ægypt into Arabia, with Monſieur de Fumes of France, and travelled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher Hill. From the ſide of Horeb (ſaith he) there falleth a very fair Spring of Water into the Vally adjoyning: where he found two Monaſteries of Chriſtian Marronites, containing ſome 100. Religious Perſons of divers Nations, who had pleaſant Gardens, delicate Fruits, and excellent Wine. Theſe (ſaith the ſame Author) give entertainment to all Strangers, which paſs that way.

Pet. Bel. lib. 2. c. 62.

Now, that there was ſome ſuch Torrent of Water near Sinai in Moſes's time, it is very probable: Firſt, becauſe he incamped thereabout almoſt a year, and drew no Water, as in other places, by Miracle: Secondly, becauſe it is written Exod. 32. 20. that when Moſes had broken the Golden Calf to Powder, which Aaron ſet up in his abſence, he caſt the Powder thereof into the Water, and made the Children of Iſrael to drink thereof.

On this Mountain, the Law by the Angel of God was given to Moſes, where he ſtaid a whole year, wanting ſome ten or twelve days: for he removed not till the 20. day of the ſecond month of the ſecond year; and he arrived about the 45. day after the egreſſion: the Law being given the 50 day.

At this Manſion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that Book; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (becauſe there is no ſtory nor other paſſage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof ſpeak ſomewhat of the Law, and the kinds and uſe thereof: whereby, if the Reader find the ſtory any way diſjoyned, he may turn over a few Leaves, and, omitting this, find the continuation thereof. We muſt firſt conſider, that as there can be neither Foundation, Building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the Rule, Level, and Square of Laws: ſo it pleaſed God to give thereby unto Moſes the powerfulleſt mean (his miraculous Grace excepted) to govern that Multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their Paſſage, and to eſtabliſh them aſſuredly in their Conqueſt. For as the North-Star is the moſt fixed director of the Sea-man to his deſired Port: ſo is the Law of God the Guide and Conductor of all in general, to the Haven of Eternal Life: the Law of Nature, from God his Eternal Law deduced, the Rule of all his Creatures: the Law Humane, depending on both theſe, the Guard of Kings, Magiſtrates, and vertuous Men; yea, the very Spirit, and the very Sinews, of every Eſtate in the World, by which they live and move. The Law, to wit, a juſt Law, being reſembled to an Heart without Affection, to an Eye without Luſt, and to a Mind without Paſſion; a Treaſurer, which keepeth for every Man what he hath, and diſtributeth to every Man what he ought to have.

This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, eſteemed ſo highly, that among them, thoſe, which were taken for the firſt makers of Laws, were honoured as Gods, or as the Sons of Gods: and the reſt, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all Poſterity for Men of no leſs vertue, and no leſs liberally beneficial to their Countries, than the greateſt and moſt proſperous Conquerors that ever governed them. The Iſraelites, the Lacedæmonians, and the Athenians, received their Laws from one: as the Iſraelites from Moſes; the Lacedæmonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romans ſometime from their firſt Kings, from their Decemviri, from their Senators, from their Lawyers, and from the People themſelves: others from the Prince, Nobility, and People; as in England, France, and in other Chriſtian Monarchies and Eſtates.

§. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right

THE word Lex, or Law, is not always taken alike, but is diverſly, and in an indifferent ſenſe uſed. For if we conſider it at large, it may be underſtood for any rule preſcribing a neceſſary mean, order, and method, for the attaining of an end. And ſo the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Laws. Or it is taken for any private ordinance of Superiors to Inferiors: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cauſe to be obſerved by force, for their Decrees do alſo uſurp that Title, according to the general acceptation of the word Law: of which Iſaiah, Wo unto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grievous things. Likewiſe, the word is uſed for the tumultuary reſolutions of the People. For ſuch conſtitutions doth Ariſtotle alſo call Laws, though evil and unſufficient. Mala lex eſt, qua tumultuarie poſita eſt; It is an ill Law that is made tumultuouſly. So as all Ordinances, good or evil, are called by the name of Laws.

Iſaiah 10.

Ethic. l. 4. c. 1.

The word Law is alſo taken for the moral habit of our mind, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and faſhioning them according to it ſelf, as to their Pattern and Platform. And thus the Law of the Fleſh which the Divines call legem fomitis, is to be underſtood. For every Law is a kind of Pattern of that which is done according unto it: in which ſenſe as † elſewhere, this moral habit or diſpoſition of the Heart is called the Frame or Figmentum of the Heart: ſo in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law. But I ſee another Law in my members, rebelling againſt the law of my mind, and leading me captive unto the law of ſin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all Creatures are ſometime called Laws*, ſo far as they agree with the reaſon of the Law Eternal; as the Law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

† Gen. 6. 5. Item 8. 2.

* So Virgil, continua has leges æternaque fœdera certis Impoſuit natura locis; Where alſo it is to be noted that he joins leges & fœdera together: as in the Scripture the Law is ſometimes called the Covenant.

Alſo private Contracts among Merchants and other Tradeſmen, do often put on the name of Laws. But Law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, preſcribing a neceſſary mean, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Civil Community. The reſt, to wit, the commandments of Tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentia magis quàm leges; rather compulsions than laws: And whatsoever is not just, St Augustine doth not allow for Laws, howsoever established: for he calls them iniquum hominum constituta, quæ nec jura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; The unjust constitutions of Men which are neither to be termed nor thought Laws. For, saith Aristotle, Legalia justa sunt factiva, & conservativa felicitatis; Just Laws are the workers and preservers of happiness: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life everlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, saith Plato, is God and his worship. Finis Legis Deus & cultus ejus.

Arist. Ethic. 5. cap. 1.

Plato in Dial. 1. de Leg.

Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines à legendo, or à ligando, of reading or binding: Leges quia lectæ & ad populum latæ, saith Varro; For after Laws were written and published, all Men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymology, à ligando, is no less agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confregerunt jugum, diruperunt vincula; they have broken the yoke, they have broken the bands.

Numm. 5. 9.

Psal. 2.

And in the second Psalm, dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let us break their bands in sunder, and cast away their cords from us.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditional promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntary submission of themselves unto it: for which word the Septuagint, & the Epistle to the Hebrews, use the word Διαθήκη, a Testament or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectual for our Salvation, but in respect of the death of the Testator, for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Heb. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrews call the law Thorah of teaching, because every Man is thereby taught his duty, both to God and Men. The Greeks call it Nomos of distributing, because it distributeth to every Man his own due; the power of the Law is the power of God: Justice being an attribute proper unto God himself. Imperium legis imperium Dei est; The raign of the Law, is the raign of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow and what to shun, or, Lex est omnium divinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen or Princess of things both humane and Divine. But this description is grounded upon the opinion of inevitable fate. Law is the very wisdom of Nature: the Reason and understanding of the prudent: and the rule of Right and Wrong. For as a right line is called Index sui & curvi, the demonstrance of it self, and of the crooked: so is the Law, the Judge and measure of Right and Wrong.

Mr. Hooker calls the Law a directive rule to goodness of operation: and though Law as touching the substance and essence, consist in understanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Jus is also diversly taken, as sometime for the matter of the Law and for common Right: sometime for the Law it self: as Jus Civile, or Jus Gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two general words Jus and Fas: whereof Jus, saith he, hath reference to Men, Fas to God. Fas lex divina, Jus lex humana. To go over another mans field, is permitted by Gods Law, not by Man's: and therefore in a thing out of controversie, Virgil used both those words: as Fas & jura sinunt: God and Men permit

Isid. Etym. l.

The word Jus or Right, is derived or taken from the old substantive Noun jussus, a bidding or commandment: or perhaps from the Greek Ζεύς, which is the name of Jupiter: or of the Latine genitive case Jovis: because as the Scripture speaks, the judgement is Gods For as it is certain that jusjurandum came of Jovisjurandum (for so we find it written in Nonius out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it juramentum Jehovæ) so also we may say, that Jus came of Jovis, quia Jovis est: because as God is the Author, and Pattern, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicegerents the Magistrates, he is the pronuncer and executor of right. Of this Jus the just are denominated, justus à jure, and justitia à justo; The right gives name to the righteous: and justice takes her name from the just.

§. V.

Of the definition of Laws, and of the Law Eternal.

But because Laws are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to divide and distinguish them. I mean those sorts of Laws, from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of humane Laws to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The Law eternal is thus defined by Thomas: Lex æterna est æternus divinæ sapientiæ conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso præcognitarum; The eternal Law is the eternal conceipt of Gods wisdom, as it is referred to the government of things foreknown by himself. Or Lex æterna est summa atq; æterna ratio divinæ sapientiæ: quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis juxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is the high and eternal reason of divine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kind of necessity according to their several natures, or conditions. Now the difference lyeth in this: That as the same Divine understanding directeth all these to their proper ends; so it is called providence: but as it imposeth a necessity according to the natures of all things which it directeth, so it is called a Law.

P. 2. q. 9. art. 1.

Th. q. 93. art. 1.

Of this eternal Law Cicero took knowledge, when in his Book of Laws, he wrote in this manner: Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & à delicto avocans: quæ non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente divina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad jubendum & ad vetandum, ratio est recta summi Jovis; That perfect reason and nature of things incouraging or impelling to rightful actions, and calling us back from evil, did not (saith he) then begin to be a Law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with Divine understanding, and therefore a true Law and a fit Princess to command and forbid is the right reason of the most high God. This Eternal Law, (if we consider it in God, or as God,) is always one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to divers objects, so the reason of Man finds it divers and manifold. It also seemeth one Law in respect of things necessary, as the motions of the Heavens, stability of the Earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another Law to Men: another to other creatures having life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternal law all things are directed, as by the counsel and providence of God: from this Law all Laws are derived, as from the rule universal: and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternal, and the divine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternal directing more largely, as well every creature, to their proper and natural ends, as it doth Man to his supernatural: but the Divine Law to a supernatural end only: the Natural Law thence derived, is but an effect of the eternal: as it were a stream from this fountain.

Tho. & Aug.

The Law humane or temporal is also thence drawn: in that it hath the form of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and only borroweth the name of a Law.

To this eternal Law all things are subjected: as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, natural, or moral, and humane. For the Law eternal runneth through all the universal, and therefore it is the Law also of things which are simple, natural, and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creatour and Director: as, Praise him all ye his Angels: praise ye him Sun and Moon, all bright Stars: Heavens of Heavens, for he hath established them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not pass: Praise ye the Lord from the Earth ye Dragons and all depths: Fire, and Hail, Snow, and Vapours, stormy Winds, which execute his Word: Mountains, and Hills: fruitful Trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattel, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternal Law bound, by the glory and felicity proposed unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other natural things and creatures, have in themselves, and in their own natures, an obedience formal to it: without any proper intention, known cause, or end proposed. For Beasts are led by sense, and natural instinct: things without life by their created form, or formal appetites, as that which is heavy to fall downward: things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatsoever is apposed. This kind of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common Nature: others to fate; a difference used in terms only; it being no other than Gods general providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appear in themselves, thence derived: there-under subjected: thence-from by his eternal Law and providence directed, even from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in Heaven and in Earth

Psal. 148.

The Schoolmen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these Laws: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternal Law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who have thence-from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetition, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the Law, the whole creature. For according to St. Augustine, Lex æterna est, qua justum est ut omnia sint ordinatissima; The law eternal is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

L. 1. de lib. arb. cap. 6.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternal Law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which St. Augustine useth a sufficient argument in his first Book of Free-Will, the sixth Chapter. For the Law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last until the time of the Padagogia of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should be expired: which time of expiration some think our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Cross he said, Consummatum est. But I rather think these words of our Saviour to have no other signification. than that now the Prophecy of their giving him Vineger to drink was fulfilled. For so S. John expounds it, when he saith v. 28. *That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Ut consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture* in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the Law ceremonial, and of so much of the judicial, as appertained peculiarly to the Jews, and agreeth not with the Law of the New Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable Law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it self: but the things prescribed change according to this eternal ordinance; of which the Wisdom of Salomon: And being one she can do all things, and remaining in her self reneweth all.

John 18. 30. Psal. 69. 22.

§. VI.
of the Law of Nature.

Of the Law of Nature as it is taken in general, I find no definition among the Schoolmen: only as it is considered in Man, it is called the impression of divine light, and a participation of the eternal Law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio divini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis æternæ in rationali creatura. Ulpian defines the natural Law to be the same which Nature hath taught all living creatures; Jus naturale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Jus istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quæ terra mariq; nascuntur, avium quoque commune est; The law of nature is not proper to Man alone, but the same is common to all living creatures: as well to Birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth. But this definition is not general, but of the natural Law in things of life.

Aug. in Epist ad Hil. 89. & in Evang. Joh. tract. 49.

Ulp. in Justin. Jure, l. 1. tit. 1.

The Law of Nature in general, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formal quality, which God in his eternal providence hath given and imprinted in the Nature of every creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in Men, inlightning our formal reason: so is it more than sense in Beasts: and more than vegetation in Plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to fly from the enemies of their lives: seeing that Bulls and Horses appear unto the sense more fearful and terrible, than the least kind of Dogs: and yet the Hare and Deer feedeth by the one, and flyeth from the other, yea though by them never seen before, and that as soon as they fall from their Dams. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their Nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India to make their Nests on the smallest Twigs which hang over Rivers, and not on any other part of the Tree, or elsewhere: to save their Eggs and young ones from the Monkies, and other Beasts, whose weight such a Twig will not bear: and which would fear to fall into the water. The instances in this kind are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing Nature of Plants, that some Trees, as the female of the Palmitto, will not bear any Fruit except the male grow in sight. But this they do by that Law which the infinite and unsearchable wisdom of God, had in all eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In Man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt where the Reason of Man hath made it self subject, and a Vassal to passions, and affections brutal: and where time and custom hath bred in Men a new Nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kind of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which St. Augustine calleth the Law of reason, but by a Nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrained to become Idolaters; that by the Laws of Lycurgus, it was permitted to Men to use one anothers Wife, and to the Women to choose them others besides their Husbands, to beget them with Child: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

Supra §. 4. ex loco ad Rom. 7. 23.

Theod. l. 9. de curandis affect: Græcarum. Acosta.

The Scythians, and the People of both Indies, hold it lawful to bury with them the best beloved Wives: as also they have many other customs remembred by G. Valentia, against Nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is that these Laws some Men avow to be natural: except it be of this corrupt Nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithless among the faithless: to provide for our selves by another mans destruction: that injury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we fear: and the like. For taking the definition of Natural Laws either out of St. Augustine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impression of divine light; the other, the dictate or sentence of practick reason) the same can teach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the exercise of Justice and Uprightness: and not to offer or perform any thing toward others, save that which we would be content should be offered or performed toward our selves. For such is the Law of Nature to the mind, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to David sheweth us good, that is, the observation of those things which lead us thereby to our last end; end; which is eternal life: though of themſelves not ſufficient without Faith and Grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the Law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforeſaid, the impreſſion of Gods divine light in men, and a participation of the law increated and eternal. For without any law written, the right Reaſon and underſtanding which God hath given us, are abilities within our ſelves, ſufficient to give us knowledge of the good and evil, which by our gratitude to God, and diſtribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchaſe for our ſelves. For when the Gentiles (ſaith S. Paul) which have not the law, do by nature thoſe things contained in the law: they having not the law, are a law unto themſelves, Now, to love God by whom we are, and to do the ſame right to all men, which we deſire ſhould be done unto us, is an effect of the pureſt reaſon: in whoſe higheſt Turrets, the quiet of conſcience hath made her reſting place, and habitation. In arce altiſſima rationis quies habitat; Therefore, the Gentiles (ſaith St. Paul) which ſhew the effects of the law written in their hearts, have their conſciences for witneſſes of thoſe effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuſe them.

Rom. 2. ver. 14.

Rom. 2. ver. 15.

And it is moſt true, that whoſoever is not a law unto himſelf (while he hopeth to abuſe the World by the advantage of hypocriſie) worketh nothing elſe, but the betraying of his own Soul, by crafty unrighteouſneſs, purchaſing eternal perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the Worlds eye, ſeeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: ſome Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the World, Sed flos ille, dum loquimur, areſcit; Thoſe flowers wither while we diſcourſe of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we we ſhould therefore inhabit and dwell within our ſelves, and become fearful witneſſes of our ſecreteſt evils, did that reverend Philoſopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept. Nil turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque tecum, maxime omnium verere teipſum; Commit nothing foul or diſhoneſt, ſaith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own heart: but above all men reverence thine own conſcience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reaſon: by which law, Men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to thoſe operations, which are anſwerable to their own form; as Fire to give heat. Now, as the reaſonable mind is the form of Man, ſo is he aptly moved to thoſe things which his proper form preſenteth unto him; to wit, to that which right reaſon offereth; and the acts of right reaſon, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reaſon, is Man leaſt excuſable: as being a reaſonable creature. For all elſe, both ſenſitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the law which God impoſed on them at their firſt creation.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the Bud of the Herb which ſeedeth ſeed, &c. and the Beaſt, which liveth thereon. He gave a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keep their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the Thunders. He cauſed the Sun to move, and to give light, and to ſerve for Signs and for Seaſons. Were theſe as rebellious as Man, for whoſe ſake they were created, or did they once break the law of their natures and forms, the whole World would then periſh, and all return to the firſt Chaos, Darkneſs, and Confuſion.

Gen. 1.

Job 6. 28.

By this natural Law, or Law of humane reaſon, did Cain perceive his own wickedneſs, and offence, in the murther of Abel: for he not only feared the diſpleaſure of God, but the revenge of Men: it being witten in his reaſon, that whatſoever he performed towards others, the ſame by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgment of well and evil doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternal law, before the law written: Moſes in the perſon of God witneſſeth, Gen. the fourth. If thou do well, ſhalt thou not be accepted? and if thou do not well, ſin lyeth at thy door.

The Schoolemen are large alſo in this queſtion of the natural Law: the ſame being opened amply by Reinerius, Antoninus, and Valentia. But it is not my purpoſe to write a volume of this Subject.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reaſon taken properly, and not a habit, as it is an evident natural judgment of practick reaſon: they divide into indemonſtrable, or needing no demonſtration (as that good is to be followed, and evil eſchewed) and demonſtrable, which is evidently proved, out of higher and more univerſal propoſitions. Again, as it anſwereth the natural appetite, preſcribing things to be deſired as good, or to be avoided as evil (as of the firſt to deſire to live, and to ſatisfy hunger, &c. and of the ſecond, to eſchew pains, ſorrow, and death) in this conſideration they divide it, according to the divers kinds of appetites that are in us. For in every Man there are three ſorts of appetites, which anſwer the three degrees of natural Law. The firſt is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the deſire, both to live, and to preſerve our being and life, alſo the deſire of iſſue, with care to provide for them: for the Father after his death lives in his Children; and therefore the deſire of life comprehends the deſire of Children. And to theſe appetites are referred the firſt indemonſtrable laws of nature, for the moſt part. For it needs no proof, that all creatures ſhould deſire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their iſſue, when they cannot in themſelves. And as Man is a being, Ens or Res: ſo he doth deſire good, and ſhun evil. For it is common to all things, to deſire things agreeable to their own natures, which is, to deſire their own good. And ſo is Good defined by Ariſtotle, to be that which all deſire. Which definition Baſil upon the 44. Pſalm approveth: Recte quidem Bonum definierunt, quod omnia expetunt, Rightly have ſome Men defined Good, or Goodneſs, to be that which all things deſire.

Tho. q. 94. art. 2.

Ethic. l. 1 c. 1.

The ſecond kind of appetite is of thoſe things which appertain to us, as we have ſenſe. Whence by the law of Nature, we deſire the delights of every ſenſe; but with ſuch moderation, as may neither glut us with ſatiety, nor hurt us with exceſs. For as Senſe it ſelf is for the preſervation of life and being: ſo is it meet, even by the law of nature, that the ſenſitive appetite ſhould not carry us to the deſtruction, either of our life or being. And although (ſeeing both theſe kinds of appetites are in Beaſts) we may well ſay, that Nature hath given divers laws unto them: In which ſenſe the Civilians define Natural right, or Jus naturale, to be the ſame which Nature hath taught all living creatures; Yet the Schoolmen admit not, that the inſtincts of beaſts can be properly called a Law, but only a Jus, or Right, which is the matter, and aim of every Law. For ſo they diſtinguiſh it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that Jus naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living creatures. In this place (ſaith Valentia) Jus is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Ulpian alſo diſtinguiſheth the right belonging to living creatures in general, from the right belonging to Men; calling the one Jus naturæ, the other Jus gentium: the Di-vines understand the Law of Nature more largely, that is for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine reason: both in Beasts and Men; and restrain the Law of Nations to a kind of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertain properly to Man, as he is a living creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selves: and the Laws of this appetite are the Commandments of our Religion.

Now although there are many other branches and divisions of this Law of Nature answering the division of Matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the moral actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the Law of Nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountain or root in the natural or motive faculty, which is but one, stirring up to good, and declining the contrary; secondly, because all is contained in that general natural precept, That good is to be followed, and ill avoided: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

That this Law of Nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly Man; because he is indued with reason; in whom as reason groweth, so this band of observing the Law of Nature increaseth,

Basil. Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Adveniente mandato peccatum revixit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to pass, which was written by S. Paul, When the Commandment came, sin revived. Neither is it a small warrant for this Law of Nature, when those which break the same, are said by S. Paul, To be delivered over

Rom. 1. 28. into a reprobate sense (or mind) to do those things which are not convenient: and again, that their

Rom. 2. 15. consciences bear witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this Law of Nature stretch not to every particular: as to command fasting and the like: yet, it commandeth in general all good, and whatsoever is agreeable to right reason. And therefore said Damascene; Homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith

L. 2. Fid. ort. c. 30. he) are made evil, by declining unto that which is contrary to nature: and S. Augustine, Omne vitium naturæ nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this Law of Nature so streight, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this Law all Men are born Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of Portions, according to unequal merit: by taking from the evil, and giving to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all Men shall enjoy the Fruits of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of Justice and Equity.

And though the Law of Nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes this her law she suffereth to be broken: as to deny a mad Man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the universal principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who according 2 Tim. 2. ing to St. Paul, abideth faithful, and cannot deny himself.

§. VII.

Of the written Law of God.

After the eternal, and natural, the Law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which Law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds: Divine, and Humane. Again, the divine positive Law is double; the old and new: The old was given unto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the World had stood 2513. whole years: and in the 67. day of this year when as Ascatades or Ascades governed the Assyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argives, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Ægypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham 430. years. And this, it seems, was the first written Law which the World received. For the very word Nomos, signifying a Law, was not then, nor long after invented by the Gracians: no not in Homer's time: who lived after the fall of Troy 80. years at least: and Troy it self was cast down 335. years, after Moses led Israel out of Ægypt. This Law, it pleased God to ingrave in stone, that it might remain a lasting Book of his expresst will in the Church; and that the Priests and people might have, whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Ægypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

Aug. de Civ. Dei, l. 1.

The reason known to us why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their Lives long, the Elders of families might easily without any written Law instruct their own Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtless they had besides the Law of Nature many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the Law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and evil; nor condemn every sin in particular: nor sufficiently terrify the Consciences of Offenders: nor expound divine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gave every day less authority than other to the natural Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, and set before the eyes of all Men: which before, they might, but would not read, in their own consciences. The Schoolmen, and the Fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessity, why the Law was written, whereof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of Sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The Law of the Lord is undefiled, converting Souls: The testimonies of the Lord are faithful, giving wisdom to Children. For the humane Law, saith St. Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the Divine Law written, forbiddeth every evil, and therefore by David it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our minds. For the Laws of Men, can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internal motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no less clean in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words converting our Souls, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiones hominum nullæ essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur; The actions of Men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the Mind.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diversity of opinion, and difference of peculiar Laws among sundry Nations, we cannot be assured of; but the Law of God bindeth all Men, and is without errour: and therefore also said David, That the Testimony of the Law of God is faithful: giving wisdom to Children.

§. VIII.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, between the Creation and the written Law, the World and People of God were left altogether to the Law of Reason and Nature, it doth not appear. For the Patriarchs of the first Age received many Precepts from God himself, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandments afterward written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by Tradition; which kind of teaching the Jews afterward called Cabala, or Receptio: Precepts received from the Mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Jews after the Law written, added the interpretation of secret Mysteries, reserved in the Bosoms of their Priests, and unlawful to be uttered to the People. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the Divine Law revealed to the Patriarchs, and from them delivered to the Posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The Commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all Beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of understanding they were sufficiently known. For finding the reason of his own name Adam of Adamah, Earth, or red Clay, he gave other names significant, not only to Beasts, but to his Children and Nephews, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the Ground or Foundation of the Church, or rather, one given in recompence for Abel that was slain: and Enosh signifieth Man or Miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the Ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all Fruits, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was Marriage first instituted: all Men thence-after being commanded to cohabit with their Wives, rather than with their Father and Mother.

† The common reading is cum terra: but God did not destroy the Earth; and why may not this preposition in this place have the same force which it hath according to Junius, Gen. 4. 1. Item 44. 4. And Deut. 34. 1. especially, seeing these words are but a repetition of that which is said, v. 7. Delebo hominem de superficie terræ. Gen. 9. v. 6.

That murther and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the Law written, and before the Flood it self, it is manifest. God himself making it appear, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of Mankind by the general Flood. For God said unto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold I will destroy them † from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all that perished: Gods Mercy and Justice interposing between the untaught, and revenge. This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the Waters were dried up from the Earth. Who so sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the Law of honouring and reverencing our Parents, was observed among the Faithful, and the contrary punished by the Fathers Curse: as, Gen. 9. 25. Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. Again, we find that the unnatural sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree; as with fire from Heaven. The sin of Adultery and Ravishment, was before the Law no less detested than the rest, as appeareth by that Gen. 34. 25. revenge, taken for Dina's forcing: and by the Gen. 38. 24. judgment which Juda gave against Tamar, That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans Wife. To these we may add the Ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of clean and unclean Beasts, of Circumcision, of the Brother to raise up Seed to his Brother that left a Widow childless, and divers other constitutions, partly Moral, and partly Ceremonial, which being delivered before the written Law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The Old Testament, may be said, not only to have been written in the hearts of Men, before it was ingraven in Stone, but also in substance to have been given in Precept to the Patriarchs. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himself, I knew not sin, but by the law: so ever the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed.

It is true, that all the Creatures of God were directed by some kind of unwritten Law; the Angels intuitively; Men by Reason; Beasts by Sense and Instinct, without Discourse; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or perception.

Of the Moral, Judicial, and Ceremonial Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOW as the word [Law] in general, as is aforesaid, hath divers significations, and is taken for all Doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diversly; as sometime for all the Old Testament, as, Now we know what soever the law saith, it saith to them which are under the law. Rom. 3. v. 19.

When it is opposed, or differenced from the Prophets, and Psalms, it is there taken for the five Books of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as All must be fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms. Luk. 24. 44.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by faith without the works of the Law. Rom. 3. 28.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of Law, and summum jus: as, For ye are not under the law, but under grace. Rom. 6. 4. Gal. 3. 18.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the ceremonies or signs are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifieth but Shadows and Figures; as, The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. John 1. 17.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs coming, it signifieth the whole Policy of the Jews Commonweal; as, Before faith came, we were kept under the Law, &c. or the Law of the Order and Institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, All the Prophets, and the Law, or the Priests, propheſied unto John. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed. Gal. 3. 23. Luk. 16. 6. Heb. 7. 12. & 10. 1.

The word [Law] is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of sin and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c. Rom. 8. 2. Rom. 7. 23.

But

But the written Law of Moſes, or the Law of the Old Teſtament, of which we now ſpeak, is thus defined: The Law is a Doctrine, which was firſt put into the minds of Men by God, and afterwards written by Moſes, or by him repeated, commanding Holineſs and Juſtice, promiſing Eternal Life conditionally, that is, to the obſervers of the Law, and threatning death to thoſe which break the Law in the leaſt. For according to Saint James, Whoſoever ſhall keep the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition uſed by the Schoolmen, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus given, Lex divina eſt divinum decretum, hominibus præſcribens modum neceſſarium ut apte pervenire poſſint ad ſupernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ eſt ultimus humanæ vitæ finis; The divine Law (ſay they) is the decree of God, preſcribing unto Men a neceſſary mean, whereby they may aptly attain ſupernatural beatitude, which is the laſt end of Mans life.

James 2. 10.

The Law of Moſes hath three parts: Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial. The Moral part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evil to be avoided, in particular; as alſo it declareth, for whoſe ſake it is to be done; as do this for I am the Lord, whereas the Law of Nature commands it but in general. Again, the Moral Law entreateth of vertue and goodneſs; the Ceremonial of Divine Service, and of Holineſs; (for external worſhip, and the order of hallowing our ſelves unto God is called Ceremony) and the Judicial teacheth the particular government, fit for the Commonwealth of the Jews, and preſcribeth orders for Juſtice and Equity. And therefore was it ſaid of Saint Paul, The commandment is juſt, holy and good: Juſt, or Juſtice being referred to the Judicial; Holy, or Holineſs to the Ceremonial; good, or honeſt to the Moral. The Judicial part is touching the Government of the Commonwealth of the Jews, in which many things muſt needs be proper to that Eſtate, as ſuch as were inſtituted either in reſpect of Place or Perſons.

Rom. 7.12.

The Ceremonial is divided into four parts, according to the four kinds of things, of which it ſpeaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Obſervances. To Sacrifices belong Beaſts, and the Fruits of the Earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Veſſels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments Circumciſion, the Paſsover, and ſuch like. For the Obſervances, they conſiſted either in prohibition of certain Meats, as not to eat the Blood and Fat of Beaſts: or in ſome other outward things, as in Waſhings, Purifyings, Anointings, and Attire, as not to wear mixt Garments of Linnen and Woollen; as alſo it prohibiteth other unnatural and unproper commixtions, as thou ſhalt not yoke together in a plough an Ox and an Aſs, or caſt mingled Seed in one Field. It alſo exhorteth natural compaſſion, and forbiddeth cruelty even to Beaſts, Birds, and Plants, whereby the Creatures of God might be deſtroyed without any profit to Man. For ſo ſome refer theſe Precepts, Thou ſhalt not kill the bird ſitting on her neſt, nor beat down the firſt buds of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring Ox, and the like, to the Ceremonial Law.

Neither is there any of theſe three parts of the Law of Moſes, but it hath as yet in ſome reſpects, the ſame power which it had before the coming of Chriſt. For the Moral liveth ſtill, and is not abrogated or taken away: ſaving in the ability of juſtifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to love and worſhip God; and to uſe Charity one towards another: which for ever ſhall be required at our hands. Therein alſo are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done: which power of directing by ſpecial Rules and Precepts of Life, it retaineth ſtill. For theſe things alſo are commanded in both Teſtaments to be obſerved: though principally for the fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremonial alſo liveth in the things which it ſore-ſignified. For the Shadow is not deſtroyed, but perfected, when the Body it ſelf is repreſented to us. Beſides, it ſtill liveth, in that it giveth both inſtruction and teſtimony of Chriſt, and in that it giveth direction to the Church for ſome Ceremonies and Types of Holy ſignification, which are ſtill expedient; though in a far fewer number than before Chriſts coming, and in a far leſs degree of neceſſity.

Laſtly, the Judicial liveth in ſubſtance, and concerning the end, and the natural and univerſal equity thereof.

But the Moral faileth in the point of Juſtification, the Ceremonial as touching the uſe and external obſervation (becauſe Chriſt himſelf is come, of whom the Ceremonies were Signs and Shadows) and the Judicial is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews Commonweal, and Policy.

§. X.

A Propoſal of nine other points to be conſidered, with a touch of the five firſt.

AS for that which remaineth in the general conſideration of the Divine written Law, it may in effect be reduced into theſe nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Majeſty of the Law-giver.
3. The property and peculiarity of the People receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the Old and New Teſtament.
7. The end and uſe of the Law.
8. The ſenſe and underſtanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The Dignity of the Law is ſufficiently proved by S. Paul in theſe words, Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and juſt, and good: which three Attributes are referred, as aforelaid, to the Moral, Ceremonial, and Judicial.

Heb. v. 13

2. The Majeſty of the Law-giver is approved in all his Creatures: who as he hath given all things their Lives, and beings, ſo he only gave the Law, who could only give the end and reward promiſed, to wit, the Salvation of Mankind: but he gave it not to Moſes immediately, but by the Miniſtry of Angels, as it is ſaid. And the law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gave the law by the ordinance of Angels.

Gal. 3. v. 19.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the People, receiving this Law, is in three reſpects. Firſt, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and diſſevered: Thirdly, in that they were the Children of the Promiſe made to Abraham. Prepared they were, becauſe they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and ſevered they were, becauſe of Gods Choice and Election. Children of the Promiſe they were, for the Promiſe was made by God unto Abraham, and his Seed: not unto his Seeds, as to Eſau and Jacob, but

Gal. 3. 16.

but to his Seed, as to Jacob, or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his Seed were the promises made: he saith not to the Seeds, as speaking of many, but to thy Seed, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time, between the Law of Nature, and Grace: The Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the Law written in the Commandments, received by Moses in the Worlds year 2514. continued to the Baptism of John: From which time begun the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the Worlds end. Other reasons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or sign of our justification: but not by it self sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in Ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousness in Moral Precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sins forgiven, who taketh away the sins of the World: And therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the Law beggerly and weak, beggerly as containing no grace, weak as not able to forgive and justifie. The blood of Goats and Bulls, and the ashes of an Heifer could only cleanse the Body; but they were figures of Christ's Blood, which doth cleanse the inward Soul. For if the Law could justifie, then Christ died in vain.

Gal. 4.
Heb. 9.
Gal. 2.

§. XI.

Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

THE Old and New Testament differ in name, and in the mean and way proposed for attaining to Salvation; as the Old by Works, the New by Grace: But in the thing it self, or object and remote end, they agree: which is, Mans Happiness and Salvation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witness of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: From which the New taketh witness. Yet the New of more excellency, in that it doth more lively express, and openly and directly delineate the ways of our Redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old Law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderful Miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: but the New was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalypse, a Testament and Gospel for ever during.

Heb. c. 8. v. 13.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chief part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalms are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chief part thereof is the glad tidings of our redemption: The other Books, as the Epistles or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentiful Interpreters thereof: The word Evangelion signifying a joyful, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer used it) the reward given to the Messenger, bringing joyful news. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing success, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tidings in general, as in Esay the 52. v. 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellency it is restrained to signifie that most joyful message of Salvation, as in Luk. 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ: and so we understand the four Gospels.

Act. 1.

Lastly, For the preaching and divulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. v. 14. and 2 Cor. 8. v. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in Volumes) is by Danaus comprised in these four.

In their Author.
In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.
In the foundation, to wit, Christ.
In the effects, that is, in Righteousness and Justification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of Doctrine. For as there was ever one Church; so was there one Covenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old Law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the old proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end: Even the Salvation of our Souls; Which according to S. Peter is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by observing the Law an earthly Kingdom, a Land flowing with Milk and Hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spiritual blessings by Christ; for by the earthly he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves Strangers, and Pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Jerusalem: According to this place of the Hebrews: All these died in Faith, and received not the promises, but saw them afar off, and believed them: confessing that they were Strangers and Pilgrims on the Earth. To which purpose also S. Augustine: Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes per promissa terrena aterna promitti. Few (saith he) do understand the old Law: not attending that by things earthly eternal are promised. And S. Hierom: Noluit Deus pascere Judæos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Judæi somniant: God would not feed the Jews as Beasts with corporal gifts and riches as themselves dream. And this may be gathered out of Gods own words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gave them this promise; but in respect of the future: to wit the safety of their Souls. For as God created both Body and Soul, so hath he of his goodness, not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever.

Heb. c. 11. v. 13.
Lib. de Civit. Dei, 18. c. 15.
In Sophon. c. 3. v. 9.

The agreement between the Old and New Testament in substance, inferrs also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the Law, laid both by the Apostles and Prophets: in whom all the promises of God in the Old and New, are assured: The Fathers having eaten the same spiritual food, which we eat in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sin and misery, which is taught us by the Law, maketh way, and as it were, serveth in subordination to the Gospel, the proper effects whereof are Mercy and Salvation: to which the Law serving as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin and misery, God sheweth his Mercy and Salvation) may be said to agree with the the Gospel in the effect. For otherwise if we sever the Law from subordination to the Gospel, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of Righteousness by Works, the other by Faith; the Law woundeth, the Gospel healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Gospel allureth; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The old restraineth the hand, the new the mind. Data est lex quæ non sanaret (saith S. Augustine) sed quæ ægrotantes probaret; The Law was Homil. ad Rom. given not to help but to discover sickness: and S. Chrysostom, Data est lex, ut se homo inveniret, non ut morbus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quæreretur; The Law was given that Man might find and know his own imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen: but that he might then seek out the Physician. For Christ came to save the World, which the Law had condemned. And as Moses was but a Servant, and Christ a Son, so the greatest benefit was reserved to be brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril: for this Law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope. Heb. 7.

§. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

THe seventh consideration is of the end & use of the Law: which is to bring us to Christ: for finding no righteousness in our own works, we must seek it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and utmost end: the next and proper end of the Law, is to prescribe righteousness, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law. Levit. 18. 5.

The second end of the Law, is to render us inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a Law, do not keep it: the Law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or half obedience: but both inward and outward Righteousness, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and chief end of the Law is, as hath been said, to send us to Christ, and his Grace, being in our selves condemned and lost. For the Law was delivered with Thunder, and with a most violent and fearful tempest, threatning Eternal Death.

The fourth end of the Law was to design, and preserve, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Discipline, and awe, till the coming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed over the whole World.

These be the ends of the Moral Law. The end and use of the Ceremonial Law, is to confirm the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The use of the Judicial, to teach us natural Equity, and Right, whereto we must conform our selves.

The sense and understanding of the Law is double, literal and spiritual: by the literal we are taught the worship and service of God: by the spiritual the figures and mystical fore-speakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being until the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the World, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered upon the Altar of the Cross, then the Jewish Sacrifices and Ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadows) ceased to bind the consciences any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof the Veil of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremonial Veils and Shadows were now to be removed, not that the Moral Law of the Commandments was hereby abolished, or weakened at all; otherwise than that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewish Doctrine, as aforesaid. For the observing of the Law was by Christ himself severely commanded: our love towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein David so much rejoyced, as he preferred the observation of the Law, before all that the World could yield. In via testimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy Law as in all manner of riches: And again, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the love of God (saith S. John) that we keep his Commandment. 1 John 5. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the Law, God himself in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandment (saith he) which I command thee this day is not hid from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in Heaven that thou shouldest say who shall go up for us to Heaven, and bring it us, and cause us to hear it that we may do it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldest say, who shall go over the Sea for us, and bring it us? &c. but the word is very near unto thee, even in thy Mouth and in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I have set before thee this day life and death, good and evil, in that I command thee this day to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his Commandments, and his Ordinances, and his Laws, that thou mayest live, &c. Neither is it said in vain in S. Matthew, Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serva mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments: and in S. John: Scio quia mandatum ejus vita æterna est; I know that his Commandment is life everlasting. And if this be the charity of God, or of Men towards God, as S. John hath taught, to wit, that we keep his Commandments: certainly he is but a lyer, that professeth to love God, and neglecteth to observe the Word of his Will, with all his power. And though I confess it is not in Mans ability, without the special grace of God, to fulfil the Law (Christ only as Man excepted) yet if we rightly consider the merciful care which God had of his People in those his Commandments, we shall find in our selves, how we borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them, from the Chains of obedience, to which the Word of God and Divine Reason hath fastened them, than that we are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our mind (greedy of liberty) proposeth to it self. For this is the love of God, that we keep his Commandments, and his Commandments are not grievous, 1 John 3. vers. 12. and if we examine every Precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the Ballance of our Consciences; it is not hard for any Man to judge, by what easie perswasions, we steal away from our own power, as unwilling to use it against our pleasing desires.

Gen. 49. 10. The Scepter shall not depart from Juda, nor a Lawgiver from between his Feet, until Shilo come.

Deut. 30. 11, 12, 13, & 14. Rom. 10. v. 6, 7, 8. Cap. 5. n. 1. C. 12. n. 9.

§. XIII.

Of the several Commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandments, but by our default.

FOR by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serve, and love one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this Precept? seeing every reasonable Man may conceive and know, that infinite power cannot be divided into many infinites: and that it is of necessity that by this Almighty Unity, all things have been caused, and are continued. And if brute Beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his his providence he hath alſo provided for every of them, which giveth to Beaſts their food, &c. there is no doubt but that they would alſo ſerve and love him only.

Pſal. 147. v. 9.

The ſecond precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worſhip of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, ſeeing this is generally true: Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta ſunt; All ill examples did ſpring and ariſe from good beginnings. For their firſt erection was to keep the memory of Men famous for their Vertue; until (ſaith Lactantius) the Devil crept into them, and (having blotted out the firſt intent) working in weak and ignorant Souls, changed the Nature of the one, and the Reaſon of the other, to ſerve himſelf thereby. For what reaſonable Man, if he be not forſaken of God, will call on thoſe blind, deaf, dumb, and dead Stocks, more worthleſs than the moſt worthleſs of thoſe, that having Life and Reaſon, implore their help, which have neither: Yea, of more vile prize and baſer, than the baſeſt of Beaſts, who have ſenſe and eſtimation? for what do we thereby (ſaith the Wiſdom of Salomon) but call to the weak for help, pray to the Dead for Life, require aid of him that hath no experience, aſſiſtance in our journies of him that cannot go, and ſucceſs in our affairs of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the block, to which he prayeth, be more ſenſeleſs: David maketh a doubt. For (ſaith he) they that make them are like unto them, and ſo are all the reſt that truſt in them.

Pſal. 35. 18.

The breach of the third Commandment is neither perſwaded by worldly pleaſure, nor worldly profit: The two greateſt inchanters of mortal Men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible diſdain of God, unleſs the hate of good Men, and Gods curſe, be accounted an advantage. For as our corrupteſt nature gives us nothing towards it, ſo can it ſatisfie no one appetite, except everlaſting ſorrow, and Hell dwell in our deſire. And therefore this ſtrange cuſtom hath the Devil brought up among Men, without all ſubtlety of argument, or cunning perſwaſion, taking thereby the greateſt and moſt ſcornful advantage over us. For ſlaughter ſatisfieth hatred, Theft gives ſatisfaction to need, Adultery to Luſt, Oppreſſion to covetouſneſs: but this contemptuous offence of Blaſphemy, and the irreverent abuſe of Gods Name, as it giveth no help to any of our worldly affections, ſo the moſt Salvage Nations of the World do not uſe it.

The fourth Commandment, to keep the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconvenience. For it giveth reſt to the Labourer, and conſolation to their Maſters. And that this Law was impoſed on Man for his benefit, Moſes teacheth in the reaſon of the Law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the ſeventh day thou ſhalt reſt, that thine Oxe and thine Aſs may reſt, and the Son of thy Maid, and the Stranger may be refreſhed.

The firſt of the ſecond Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the ſame, is a gratitude which nature it ſelf hath taught us towards them, who after God gave us life and being, have begotten us, and born us, cheriſhed us in our weak and helpleſs infancy, and beſtowed on us the harveſt and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore in the temporal and judicial Ordinances, curſing of Parents, or the offering them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou ſhalt not Murther, that is, thou ſhalt not do the acts following the affections of hatred. For the Law of God, and after it our own Laws, and in effect the Law of all Nations, have made difference between ſlaughter caſual, and furious. Affectio enim tua (ſaith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work ſuch as it is. And certainly whoſoever cannot forbear to commit murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any uſe of his own will.

The third of the ſecond Table, commands us from Adultery. Now, if the preſervation of Virginity have been poſſible, for thouſands of Men and Women, who in all ages have maſtered their fleſhly deſires, and have returned chaſt to the grave: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the diſhonour and injury, which we offer to others by ſuch a violation, ſeeing Marriage is permitted by the Laws of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no Man living whom the deſire of Beauty and form hath ſo conſtrained, but he might with eaſe forbear the proſecution of this ill: did not himſelf give ſuck to this Infant, and nouriſh warmth till it grow to ſtrong heat, heat till it turn to fire, and fire to Flame.

Nuptiæ replent terram, Virginitas Paradiſum.

The fourth of the ſecond Table, is, that we ſhall not ſteal. And if that kind of violent Robbery had been uſed in Moſes's time, which many Ruffians practiſe now a-days in England, and to the diſhonour of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the World among Chriſtians, out of doubt he would have cenſured them by death, and not by reſtitution, though quadruple. For I ſpeak not of the poor and miſerable Souls, whom hunger and extream neceſſity inforceth, but of thoſe deteſted Thieves, who to maintain themſelves Lord-like, aſſault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring-man, or break by violence into other Mens Houſes, and ſpend in Bravery, Drunkenneſs, and upon Harlots, in one day, what other Men ſometime have laboured for all their lives: impoveriſhing whole Families: And taking the Bread and Food from the mouths of their Children. And that this Commandment might eaſily be obſerved, it would ſoon appear, if Princes would reſolve, but for a few years to pardon none. For it is the hope of life, and the argument of ſparing the firſt offence, that incourageth theſe Hell-hounds. And if every Man may preſume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Commonwealth, but theſe Men would in a ſhort time impoveriſh or deſtroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this ſecond Table, is, the prohibition of falſe Witneſs: From which if Men could not forbear, all ſurety of Eſtate, and Life, were taken away. And ſo much did God deteſt a falſe Witneſs, and a falſe Accuſer, eſpecially in matters Criminal, that the Law ordained him to ſuffer the ſame Death or Puniſhment, which he ſought by falſhood to lay on his Brother.

The laſt of the ten Commandments forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belongeth to another Man, either the bodies of their Wives for Concupiſcence, or their Goods for deſire of Gain. And this precept ſeemeth the hardeſt for Men to obſerve; ſo eſteemed by reaſon of our frail affections: and yet if we judge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconſiderate fancies and vain thoughts. For although it be not eaſie to maſter all our ſuddain paſſions, yet we may reſtrain and hinder their growing, and farther increaſe, if we pleaſe to intend our ſtrength, and ſeek for grace. How the word Coveting reacheth to all thoſe, it is to be conſidered. For Concupiſcentia, according to ſome, eſt effrenatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unreſtrained appetite of having: And as touching ſuch an appetite, we cannot excuſe our ſelves by any our natural frailty, or unadviſed error; But, as I ſuppoſe, the word Concupiſcence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evil intent, or for ſome urging inclination thereunto. All the queſtion is of the latter ſort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id eſt, non deliberatus ratione quæ eſt principium proprium actus boni aut vitioſi; Such paſſions or inclinations are unperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reaſon, which is the proper principle of a good or vitious action. And ſure, it may ſeem, that ſo long as we reſiſt ſuch motions, they harm us not; as they ſay, Quamdiu refragamur nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as we give no aſſent unto them, it is thought by ſome that they hurt us not: and that then only they hurt when we ſuffer them to bear ſway. But theſe Men, as it ſeems, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in every Commandment, not only the outward act, but alſo the inward aſſent unto evil, though it break not out into Act, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the reſt, the diſtinction of deſires is to be held: that ſome are with aſſent, and unbridled; others bridled, and without aſſent. For ſo even the Moral Philoſopher can tell us, that the Continent Man hath evil deſires, but without aſſent (for they are bridled by the ſtrength of right reaſon) as on the other ſide the Incontinent hath good deſires, but reſtrained and ſuppreſſed by contrary Paſſions. The evil deſires when they are accompanied with aſſent, are in every Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act: And therefore if we will have any thing proper to this Commandment, we muſt needs ſay, that the evil deſires of the Continent Man (that is, even thoſe which we reſiſt and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridleth his evil deſires, be much better than he that yieldeth unto them: Yet ſuch a Man, even according to the Heathen Philoſopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous Man. For Ariſtotle himſelf makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but only a degree unto it: confeſſing that though the Continent Man do well in bridling his evil Affections, yet he doth not all, ſeeing he ought not ſo much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true Divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he ſaith, that in the Continent Man the having of theſe evil deſires, though he reſiſt them, is the cauſe that he cannot be called a vertuous Man: ſo we, that the having of them is a ſin. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of Divinity to give the true reaſon of this Doctrine: which is, that every one ſinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: Whence it followeth that the evil deſires of the Continent Man, that is, of him which bridleth them, muſt needs be ſin: ſeeing ſuch deſires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleaſed God, to make us know, that by our faithful endeavours to keep his Commandments, we witneſs our love toward himſelf: We may not ſafely give liberty to our vanities, by caſting back upon God (who is juſtice it ſelf) that he hath given us precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impoſſible for us to keep. For as he is accurſed (ſaith S. Hierom) that avows that the Law is in all things poſſible to be obſerved: ſo he hath made this addition. Maledictus qui dicit impoſſibilia Deum præcepiſſe; Accurſed is he that ſaith that God hath commanded things (in themſelves, and not through our fault) impoſſible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the Law: ſo is our weakneſs alſo in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus ſafely to be underſtood, that we ſhould without evaſion, or without betraying of our ſelves, do our faithful endeavours to obſerve them: which if we do unfeignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our deſires therein. For that there is no Man juſt, David witneſſeth. Enter not into judgment with thy Servant, for in thy ſight no fleſh that liveth ſhall be juſtified. And in the firſt of Kings, There is Man that ſinneth not: And again, Who can ſay I have made my heart clean? But ſeeing there is no ſin grievous without deliberation; let every Mans Conſcience judge him, whether he give way willingly, or reſtrain himſelf in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King gives to his Subject a Commandment upon pain of loſs of his love, to perform ſome ſervice: if the Subject neglecting the ſame, ſeek to ſatisfie his Soveraign with ſhifting excuſes, out of doubt ſuch a Prince will take himſelf to be derided therein.

Pſal. 143. 2. C. 8. v. 46. Pro. 20. 9.

§. XIV.

If there were not any Religion nor Judgment to come, yet the Decalogue were moſt neceſſary to be obſerved.

AND if we conſider adviſedly, and ſoberly, of the Moral Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moſes gave unto his people, it will appear that ſuch was his merciful providence in the choice of them, as were there neither pain, nor profit adjoyned to the obſerving, or not obſerving of them, were there no Divine power at all, nor any Religion amongſt men, yet if we did not for our own ſakes ſtrive to obſerve theſe Laws: all ſociety of Men, and all endeavours, all happineſs and contentment in this Life would be taken away: And every State and Common-weal in the World fall to the Ground and diſſolve. Therefore, theſe Laws were not impoſed as a burthen, but as a bleſſing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every Man might enjoy the fruits of his own Travel, that right might be done to all Men from all Men: That by Juſtice, Order, and Peace, we might live the lives of reaſonable Men, and not of Beaſts; of Free-men, and not of Slaves; of Civil Men, and not of Salvages. And hereof making our humane reaſon only Judge, Let us ſee the inconveniences in this Life which would follow by the breach and neglect of theſe Laws.

As firſt, what would the iſſue be if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a far greater Hatred, War, and Blood-ſhed follow, than that which the difference of ceremony, and diverſity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, even among thoſe Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Chriſt?

And what could it profit Mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of Gold, Metal, dead Stones, and rotten Wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the loſs of time, and an impoſſibility to receive thence-from, either help or comfort.

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therewith this diſadvantage, and ill to Man, that whoſoever taketh the name of God in vain, ſhall not at any time benefit himſelf by calling God to witneſs for him, when he may juſtly uſe his holy Name.

The obſerving the Sabbath holy, giveth reſt to Men and Beaſts, and Nature her ſelf requireth intermiſſion of Labour.

If we deſpiſe our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our own Children to ſcorn and neglect us, when our aged years require comfort and help at their hands.

If murther were not forbidden, and ſeverely puniſhed, the Races of Mankind would be extinguiſhed: and whoſoever would take the liberty to deſtroy others, giveth liberty to others to deſtroy himſelf.

If

If Adultery were lawful and permitted, no Man could ſay unto himſelf, This is my Son: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour deſcend to poſterity, no indeavour by vertue and undertaking to raiſe families: murthers and poiſonings between Man and Wife would be daily committed: and every Man ſubject to moſt filthy and unclean diſeaſes.

If Stealth and violent rapine were ſuffered, all mankind would ſhortly after periſh, or live as the ſalvages, by roots and acorns. For no Man laboureth but to enjoy the Fruits thereof. And ſuch is the miſchief of robbery, as where Moſes for leſſer crimes appointed reſtitution four-fold, policy of State and neceſſity hath made it death.

To permit falſe Witneſſes, is to take all mens lives and eſtates from them by corruption: the wicked would ſwear againſt the vertuous: the waſter againſt the wealthy: the Idle Begger and loiterer, againſt the careful and painful labourer: all trial of right were taken away, and juſtice thereby baniſhed out of the World.

The coveting of that which belongs to other Men, bringeth no other profit than a diſtraction of Mind with an inward vexation: for while we covet what appertains to others, we neglect our own: our appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitleſs hopes, ſo long as we do but covet; and if we do attain to the deſire of the one, or the other, to wit, the Wives or goods of our Neighbours, we can look for no other, but that our ſelves ſhall alſo, either by theft or by ſtrong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the general and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in reſpect of himſelf, did the moſt merciful and provident God ordain them; without the obſervation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the Earth, with all the bleſſings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable, and of no uſe. For we ſhould remain but in the ſtate of brute Beaſts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

§. XV.

Of humane Law, written and unwritten.

HUmane Law, of which now it followeth to ſpeak, is firſt divided into two, viz. Written, and Unwritten. The unwritten conſiſts of uſage, approved by time: which Iſidore calls Mores: and he defines Mores to be Conſuetudines vetuſtate probatæ, to be cuſtoms approved by antiquity or unwritten Laws. Now cuſtom differeth from uſe, as the cauſe from the effect: in that Cuſtom is by uſe and continuance eſtabliſhed into a Law: but yet there where the Law is defective, ſaith Iſidore.

And of Cuſtoms there are two general Natures, containing innumerable particulars, the firſt are written Cuſtoms, received and exerciſed by Nations, as the Cuſtoms of Burgundy, and Normandy: the ancient general Cuſtom of England, and the Cuſtoms of Caſtil, and other Provinces.

The ſecond are theſe petty Cuſtoms, uſed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The general or National Cuſtoms are ſome written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty Cuſtoms are ſeldom written, but witneſſed by teſtimony of the inhabitants. The Cuſtoms of the Dutchy of Cornwal comprehending alſo the Stannery of Devon, as touching Tin, and Tin cauſes, are Written in Devon, but not in Cornwal. But howſoever uſe and time hath made theſe Cuſtoms as Laws, yet ought every Cuſtom to be rationabilis, as well as præſcripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de jure ab initio non ſubſiſtit; That which at firſt was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (ſaith Ulpian) quod ab initio vitioſum eſt, non poteſt tractu temporis convaleſcere; Courſe of time amends not that which was naught from the firſt beginning. For theſe two defences are neceſſary in all Laws of Cuſtom; the one, that it be not repugnant to the Law Divine, and Natural: the other, that the Cauſe and reaſon be ſtrong, proving a right birth, and neceſſary continuance: it being manifeſt that every Cuſtom, which is againſt the Law, had his beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former conſiderations to be allowed. And it is true, that all Cuſtoms of this Nature were but tolerated for a time, by the Lawmakers, though they have been ſince continued, becauſe poſterity is not bound to examine by what cauſe their Anceſtors were thereto moved. For non ſufficit ſimplex toleratio: And it is in this ſort over-ruled in the Law; Per populum conſuetudo contra legem induci non poteſt, niſi de voluntate illius qui novam legem, & novam conſtitutionem ſtatuere poteſt, qui ſolus princeps eſt; The people cannot bring in a New Cuſtom, againſt Law: ſave by his will, who hath power to make a New Law and Ordinance, which is only the Prince.

In Reg. Juriſ. v. 2. q. 117. art. 1. Ulp. l. 29.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane Law written, is by ſome defined to be the decree or doom of practick reaſon: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the adviſement of Wiſemen, and the reſtraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Iſidore calls the Law a Conſtitution written, agreeing with Religion, fitteſt for Government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione conſiſtit; All that ſtands with reaſon.

Laſtly, and more preciſely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law natural, and eternal: made by the rational diſcourſe of thoſe, that exerciſe publick authority: preſcribing neceſſary obſervances to the ſubject. That every Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Auguſtine teacheth, ſaying: Mihi lex eſſe non videtur, quæ juſta non fuerit; It ſeems to be no Law at all to me, which is not juſt: and juſt it cannot be, except it agree with the Law natural and eternal. For there is no Law juſt and legitimate (ſaith S. Auguſtine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the eternal. Nihil juſtum atque legitimum eſt, quod non ab æterna lege ſibi homines derivaverint.

L. 1. de lib. Arb. cap. 6.

Secondly, it ought to be conſtituted by diſcourſe of reaſon, whereby it is diſtinguiſhed from the Law natural, to wit, the natural, indemonſtrable, or needing no demonſtration from whence the Law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authoriſed Magiſtracy, it cannot be doubted, be the Government of what kind ſoever. For it falleth otherwiſe under the Title of thoſe decrees called Violentiæ, or iniquæ conſtitutiones; Violences, or wicked conſtitutions.

Of humane Law there are four properties, eſpecially anſwering theſe four conditions in the former definition. Firſt, as it is drawn out of the Law of Nature: ſo every particular of the Humane Law may be reſolved into ſome principle or rule of the Natural.

4. Parts.

Tho. q. 9. 5. art. 2.

Secondly, it is to be conſidered as it is referred unto, and doth reſpect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publick authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the Law it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and divers, as all humane actions are divers, which may fall under it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Julia de Adulteriis, alia Cornelia de Sicariis; The Law of Julian against Adultery is one, the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another. Now the humane Law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, divided into the Law of Nations, and the Civil.

The Law of Nations is taken less or more properly; less properly for every Law which is not of it self, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Ulpian understands it: for he defineth Jus gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is only common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very Nature of this Law of Nations: but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other Divine Revelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawn from a very probable, though not from an evident principle, yet so probable that all Nations do assent unto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadours be granted between enemies, &c. which National Law according to divers acceptions, and divers considerations had of the Humane Law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Natural, sometime of the Humane.

Jus Civile, or the Civil Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in divers estates it is also divers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately derived from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations do not agree in, or easily assent unto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are divers, and do not fit all estates. Hereof Ulpian, Jus civile, neque in totum à naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei servit: itaq; cum aliquid addimus vel detrahimus Juri communi, Jus proprium, id est, Civile efficimus; The Civil Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore, when we add ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Civil Law.

In Leg. 6. ta. ff. de Justitia Jure.

The Law now commonly called the Civil Law, had its birth in Rome: and was first written by the Decemviri, 303. years after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian, and other Grecian Laws, as out of the ancient Roman customs and Laws Regal. The Regal Laws were devised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiæ, or Papyrianæ, because they were gathered by Papyrius, Tarquin then raigning. For though so many of the former Laws as maintained Kingly authority were abolished, with the name: yet those of Servius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the Laws of the twelve Tables. To these Laws of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plebiscita: those of the Lawyers, called responsa prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrate: which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetual Laws: and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum: as those and the like Collections of Justinian afterward were.

Dion. Hal.

C. Sigon. l. 1. out of Pomponius.

The difference anciently between Laws and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that Laws are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soveraign authority (be the soveraignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withal general and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Jussum Magistratus, unless by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicto tribuunt, legem annuam esse dicunt; They who ascribe the most unto an Edict, say that it is a Law for one year. Though Isidore doth also express by the word Constitutions or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives: as Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordain or proclaim.

Lastly, the Humane Law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiastical, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporal good, to wit, the peace and tranquillity of the Commonwealth: the Ecclesiastical the spiritual good, and right Government of the Ecclesiastical Commonwealth, or Church, illud naturæ legem, hoc divinam spectat; That respecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God And so may Jus Civile be taken two ways: first, as distinguished from the Law of Nations, as in the first division: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and divers from the Ecclesiastical. But this division of the Schoolmen is obscure. For although the Civil be the same with the Secular, as the Civil is a Law, yet the Secular is more general, and comprehendeth both the Civil, and all other Laws not Ecclesiastical. For of Secular Laws, in use among Christian Princes, and in Christian Commonweals, there are three kinds; the Civil which hath everywhere a voice: and is in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerful; the Laws of England called Common, and the Laws of custom or Provincial. In Spain besides the Law Civil, they have the customs of Castil, and other Provinces. In France besides the Civil, the customs of Burgundy, Bloys, Berry, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux situez & assis en Lodunois, seront gouvernez selon les coustumes du dit Pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall be governed according to the customs of that place. There are also in France the Customs of Normandy, and these of two kinds: General, and Local; and all purged and reformed by divers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient Customs, before and since their reformation have these words. Nos autem, registrum prædictum, usus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus & authoritate Regia confirmamus; The Register aforesaid, laudable use, and ancient Customs, we praise, approve, and by our Kingly authority confirm. The common Law of England is also compounded of the ancient Customs of the same, and of certain Maximes by those Customs of the Realm approved. Upon which Customs also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

Art. 3. tit. 5. C. 13.

These ancient Customs of England have been approved by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that Custom by which no Man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient Custom of England that the eldest Son should inherit without partition: In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the Custom for all Lands (that have not been resigned into the Kings hands) that that the eldeſt of the Houſe ſhall enjoy the inheritance during his own life: and ſo the ſecond and third eldeſt (if there be ſo many Brothers) before the Heir in lineal deſcent: this is called the Cuſtom of Taniſtry. For example, if a Lord of Land have four Sons, and the eldeſt of thoſe four have alſo a Son, the three Brothers of the eldeſt Son ſhall after the death of their Brother, enjoy their Fathers Lands before the Grand-child: the Cuſtom being grounded upon the reaſon of neceſſity. For the Iriſh in former times having always lived in a ſubdivided Civil War, not only the greateſt againſt the greateſt, but every Baron and Gentleman one againſt another, were inforc'd to leave ſucceſſors of age and ability to defend their own Territories. Now as in Normandy, Burgundy, and other Provinces of France, there are certain peculiar, and petty Cuſtoms, beſides the great and general Cuſtom of the Land, ſo are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greateſt bulk of our Laws, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: Laws propounded and approved by the three Eſtates of the Realm, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all Men are therefore bound, becauſe they are Acts of choice, and ſelf deſire. Leges nulla alia cauſa nos tenent quam quod judicio populi receptæ ſunt; The Laws do therefore bind the ſubjects, becauſe they are received by the judgment of the ſubject. Tum demum humanæ leges habent vim ſuam, cum fuerint non modo inſtitutæ, ſed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane Laws have their ſtrength, when they ſhall not only be deviſed, but by the approbation of the People confirmed.

Aug. de vera relig. cap. 31. Gratian. in dec. diſt. 4. Cum in iſtis.

Iſidore faſteneth theſe properties to every Chriſtian Law, that the ſame be honeſt, that it be poſſible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the Cuſtom of the Country; alſo for the time and place convenient, profitable, and manifeſt, and without reſpect of private profit, that it be written for the general good. He alſo gives four effects of the Law, which Modoſtinus comprehends in two: to wit, obligation, and inſtigation: the former binds us by fear, to avoid vice: the later incourageth with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicero, Legem oportet eſſe vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemq; virtutum; It behoveth the Law to be a mender of vices, and a commender of vertues. The part obligatory or binding us to the obſervation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all Laws: and it is two-fold, the one conſtraineth us by fear of our conſciences, the other by fear of external puniſhment. Theſe two effects the Law performeth, by the exerciſe of thoſe two powers, to wit, Coactive, and Directive.

The ſecond of theſe two effects remembred by Modeſtinus, is Inſtigation, or incouragement to vertue, as Ariſtotle makes it the end of the Law, to make Men vertuous. For Laws being ſuch as they ought to be, do both by preſcribing and forbidding, urge us to well-doing: laying before us the good and the evil, by the one and the other purchaſed. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evil, are thoſe into which the Law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and ſubſtance thereof: ſaying, Declina à malo, & fac bonum; Decline from evil, and do good.

Pſal. 36.

§. XVI.

That only the Prince is exempt from humane Laws, and in what ſort.

NOW whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any perſon, it is doubtfully diſputed among thoſe that have written of this ſubject, as well Divines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soveraign Princes be compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the Law, as aforeſaid, the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive, they ought to be ſubject, but not to that which conſtraineth. For as touching violence or puniſhments, no Man is bound to give a prejudical judgment againſt himſelf: and if equals have not any power over each other, much leſs have inferiours over their ſuperiours, from whom they receive their authority and ſtrength.

And ſpeaking of the ſupreme power of Laws, ſimply then is the Prince ſo much above the Laws, as the Soul and body united, is above a dead and ſenſeleſs carcaſs. For the King is truly called, Jus vivum & lex animata; An animate and living Law. But this is true, that by giving authority to Laws, Princes both add greatneſs to themſelves, and conſerve it, and therefore was it ſaid of Bracton out of Juſtinian. Meritò debet Rex tribuere legi, quod lex attribuit ei: nam lex facit ut ipſe ſit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the Law, which the Law firſt attributeth to the King, for it is the Law that doth make Kings.

But whereas Bracton aſcribeth this power to the humane Law, he is therein miſtaken. For Kings are made by God, and Laws divine: and by humane Laws only declared to be Kings. As for the places remembred by the Divines and Lawyers, which infer a kind of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conſcience, and profit ariſing from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to give an accompt of their actions to God only.

Bract. l. 2.

Tibi Soli peccavi, ſaith David; Againſt thee only have I ſinned: therefore the Prince cannot be ſaid to be ſubject to the Law. Princeps non ſubiicitur legi; For ſeeing according to the Schoolmen, the Law humane is but quoddam organum & inſtrumentum poteſtatis gubernativæ: non videtur poſſe ejus obligatio ad eum ſe extendere, ad quem ipſa vis poteſtatis humanæ non pertinet: ſed vis poteſtatis humanæ non ſe extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa reſidet. Ergo neq; lex condita per talem poteſtatem obligare poteſt ipſum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia activa, eſt principium tranſmutandi aliud; Seeing humane Law (ſay they) is but a kind of organ, or inſtrument, of the power that governeth, it ſeems that it cannot extend it ſelf to bind any one whom no humane power can control, or lay hold off: but the governour himſelf, in whom the governing power doth reſide, is a perſon that cannot by himſelf, or by his own power be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by ſuch a power, cannot bind the Law-maker himſelf: for every active ability is a cauſe or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it ſelf reſides. And ſeeing Princes have power to deliver others from the obligation of the Law: Ergo etiam poteſt ipſemet Princeps ſive legiſlator ſua ſe voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore alſo may a Prince or Law-maker at his own will and pleaſure deliver himſelf from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded. Subditi tenentur leges obſervare neceſſitate coactionis, Princeps verò ſola voluntate ſua, & intuitu boni communis; The ſubjects jects are bound to fulfil the Law by neceſſity of compulſion, but the Prince only by his own will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politick Laws, given by Moſes to the Nation of the Iſraelites, whether they ought to be a Precedent, from which no Civil Inſtitutions of other People ſhould preſume to digreſs, I will not preſume to determine, but leave it as a queſtion for ſuch Men to decide, whoſe Profeſſions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirm, that we ought not to ſeem wiſer than God himſelf, who hath told us that there are no Laws ſo righteous, as thoſe which it pleaſed him to give to his Elect People to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their ſeveral qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next Borderers, no leſs than in their peculiar Languages, which diſagreeable Conditions to govern aptly, one and the ſame Law very hardly were able. The Roman Civil Laws did indeed contain in order, a great part of the then known World, without any notable inconvenience, after ſuch time as once it was received and become familiar: yet was not the adminiſtration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much unto the natural Cuſtoms of the ſundry People, which it governed. For whether it be through a long continued perſwaſion; or (as Aſtrologers more willingly grant) ſome influence of the Heavens; or peradventure ſome temper of the Soil and Climate, affording matter of provocation to Vice (as Plenty made the Sybarites luxurious; Want and Opportunity to ſteal, makes the Arabians to be Thieves) very hard it were to forbid by Law, an Offence ſo common, with any People, as it wanted a Name, whereby to be diſtinguiſhed from Juſt and Honeſt. By ſuch rigour was the Kingdom of Congo unhappily divertted from the Chriſtian Religion, which it willingly at the firſt embraced, but after with great fury rejected, becauſe plurality of Wives was denied unto them, I know not how neceſſarily, but more contentiouſly than ſeaſonably. In ſuch caſes, methinks, it were not amiſs to conſider, that the high God himſelf permitted ſome things to the Iſraelites, rather in regard of their natural diſpoſition (for they were hard-hearted) than becauſe they were conſonant unto the ancient Rules of the firſt perfection. So, where even the general nature of Man doth condemn (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjuſt; there may the Law, given by Moſes, worthily be deemed the moſt exact reformer of the evil, which forceth Man, as near as may be, to the will and pleaſure of his Maker. But where Nature or Cuſtom hath entertained, a vicious, yet not intolerable Habit, with ſo long and ſo publick approbation, that the Vertue oppoſing it, would ſeem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the Engliſh Faſhion of Apparel in Turkie: there may a wiſe and upright Law-giver, without preſumption, omit ſomewhat that the rigour of Moſes his Law required; even as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter meerly Eccleſiaſtical, and therefore the leſs capable of diſpenſation, praying for the People; The good Lord be merciful unto him, that prepareth his whole Heart to ſeek the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleanſed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which Prayer the Lord heard and granted.

2 Chron. cap. 30. v. 18, 19.

To this effect it is well obſerved by Maſter Doctor Willet, that the moral Judicials of Moſes do partly bind, and partly are let free. They do not hold affirmatively that we are tied to the ſame ſeverity of puniſhment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the puniſhment of Death ſhould not be adjudged, where ſentence of Death is not given by Moſes: Chriſtian Magiſtrates ruling under Chriſt the Prince of Peace, that is, of Clemency and Iſay 9. Mercy, may abate of the ſeverity of Moſes's Law, and mitigate the puniſhment of Death, but they cannot add unto it to make the burden more heavy: for to ſhew more rigour than Moſes, becometh not the Goſpel.

But I will not wander in this copious Argument, which hath been the Subject of many learned Diſcourſes, neither will I take upon me, to ſpeak any thing definitively in a Caſe which dependeth ſtill in ſome Controverſie among worthy Divines Thus much (as in honour of the Judicial Law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly ſay, that the defence of it hath always been very plauſible. And ſurely, howſoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a general and only Law; yet ſhall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the Conſcience of a Judge may reſt, with equal ſatisfaction, in making Interpretation, or giving Sentence upon Doubts, ariſing out of any Law beſides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Judge could have been Witneſs, of whom Forteſcue that notable Bulwark of our Laws doth ſpeak, complaining of a Judgment given againſt a Gentlewoman at Saliſbury, who being accuſed by her own Man, without any other Proof, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to aſhes: the Man who accuſed her, within a Year after being Convict for the ſame Offence, confeſt that his Miſtris was altogether innocent of that cruel Fact, whoſe terrible Death he then (though over-late) grievouſly lamented: but this Judge, ſaith the ſame Author, Sæpius ipſe mihi faſſus eſt, quod nunquam Ca. 3. in vita ſua animum ejus de hoc facto ipſe purgaret; He himſelf often confeſſed unto me, that he ſhould never during his Life, be able to clear his Conſcience of that Fact. Wherefore that acknowledgment which other Sciences yield unto the Metaphyſicks, that from thence are drawn Propoſitions, able to prove the Principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themſelves cannot be proved, may juſtly be granted by all other politick Inſtitutions, to that of Moſes; and ſo much the more juſtly, by how much the Subject of the Metaphyſicks, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium, The Being of beings, the only Good, the fountain of Truth, whoſe fear is the beginning of Wiſdom. To which purpoſe well ſaith Saint Auguſtine: Conditor legum temporalium ſi vir bonus eſt & ſapiens, illam ipſam conſulit æternam, de qua nulli animæ judicare datum eſt; The Author of temporal Laws if he be good and wiſe, doth therein conſult the Law eternal, to determine of which there is no power given to any Soul. And as well Prince Edward, in Forteſcue his Diſcourſe, Nemo poteſt melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam poſuit Dominus; No man can lay a better or another foundation, than the Lord hath laid.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Iſraelites from the receiving of the Law, to the death of Moſes.

§. I.

Of the numbring and diſpoſing of the Hoſt of Iſrael, for their marches through the Wilderneſs: with a note of the reverence given to the worſhip of God, in this ordering of their Troops.

WHEN Moſes had received the Law from God, and publiſhed it among the People, and finiſhed the Tabernacle of the Ark and Sanctuary; he muſtered all the Tribes and Families of Iſrael: and having ſeen what numbers of Men, fit to bear Arms, were found in every Tribe, from 20. years of Age upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the Lord, ſuch Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in every Tribe moſt eminent. The number of the whole Army was 603550 able Men for the Wars, beſides Women and Children; alſo, beſides the Strangers which followed them out of Ægypt. This great Army was divided by Moſes into four groſs and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the ſtrength of three whole Tribes.

The firſt of theſe containing 186400. able Men, conſiſted of three Regiments, which may well, in reſpect of their numbers, he called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Iſſachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting Men, led by Naaſon: in Iſſachar 54400. led by Nathanael: in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All theſe marched under the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vantguard, and was the firſt that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general incamping on the Eaſt-ſide of the Army; which was held the firſt Place, and of greateſt Dignity.

The ſecond Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the Hoſt of Reuben, had joyned unto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched under the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. under Elizur: in Simeon 59300. under Shelumiel: in Gad 45650. under Eliaſaph. Theſe had the ſecond place, and incamped on the South-ſide of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched under the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joyned the Regiments of Manaſſe and Benjamin; who joyned together, made in number 108100. able Men. Theſe marched in the third Place, incamping on the Weſt-quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. under Eliſhama: Manaſſe 32200. under Gamliel: Benjamin 35400. under Abidam.

The fourth and laſt Army, or Squadron, of the general Army, containing 157600. able Men, marched under the Standard of Dan; to whom were joyned the two Tribes of Nephtali and Aſher. And theſe had the Rereward, and moved laſt, incamping on the North-ſide. Dan had 62700. under Ahiezer: Aſher 41500. under Pagiel: Nephtali 53400. under Ahira.

Beſides theſe Princes of the ſeveral Tribes, there were ordained Captains over Thouſands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over Tens; as it may appear by that mutiny and inſurrection againſt Moſes, Numb. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there aroſe up againſt Moſes 250. Captains of the Aſſembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renown: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principal Mutiners, with thoſe 250. Captains that followed them, were not any of the twelve Princes of the Tribes, or General Colonels before ſpoken of, as by their names Num. 1. is made manifeſt.

The bleſſing which Iſrael gave to his Children, took place not only in the diviſion of the Land of Promiſe, and other things of more conſequence, long after following; but even in ſorting them under their ſeveral Standards in the Wilderneſs it was obſerved. For Judah had the precedency and the greateſt Army, which alſo was wholly compounded of the Sons of Lea, Jacob's Wife. Reuben having loſt his birth-right, followed in the ſecond place, accompanied with his Brother Simeon, who had undergone his Fathers curſe; and with Gad, the Son of his Mothers Hand-maid. Joſeph, who in Temporal bleſſings had the Prerogative of the firſt-born a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and divided into two Regiments: the younger (according to Jacob's Prophecy) taking place before the Elder. He was aſſiſted by Benjamin, his beſt beloved Brother, the other Son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldeſt Son of Jacob's Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacob's Prophecy. He had with him under his Standard none of the Children of Lea, or Rachel, but only the Sons of the Hand-maids.

In the middle of theſe four Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, ſurrounded by the Levites. Near unto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reaſon of theſe four powerful Armies, which guarded the ſame: ſo was it death for any of the Children of Iſrael to come near it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was committed. So Sacred was the movable Temple of God, and with ſuch reverence guarded and tranſported, as 22000. Perſons were dedicated to the ſervice and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their ſeveral Offices and Functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the People obſerved the former order in their incampings: ſo did the Levites quarter themſelves, as in an inner ſquare, on every ſide of the Tabernacle; The Geſhurites on the Weſt, within the Army, and Standard of Ephraim, over whom Eliaſaph commanded, in number 7500. The Family of Cohath on the South-ſide, guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and between him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third Company were of the Family of Merari, over whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200. and theſe were lodged on the North ſide within the Army of Dan; On the Eaſt-ſide, and next within thoſe Tribes and Forces which Judah led, did Moſes and Aaron lodge, and their Children, dren, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies, and of the People; under whom, as the chief of all the other Levitical Families, was Eleazar the Son of Aaron, his successor in the high Priesthood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching: the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. The reverend care, which Moses the Prophet and chosen servant of God, had in all that belonged even to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Ark and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeal born towards God himself. The industry used in the framing thereof, and every, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutiful observance in the laying up and preserving the holy Vessels; the solemn removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the provident defence of the same, which all Ages have in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptist, Browniſt, and other Sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accounted a kind of Popery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous dispostion: insomuch as Time would soon bring to pass (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barns, and from thence again into the Fields and Mountains, and under the Hedges; and the Offices of the Ministery (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-Government, left to newness of opinion and Mens fancies: yea, and soon after, as many kinds of Religions would spring up, as there are Parish-Churches within England: every contentious and ignorant Person clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; insomuch as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appear to the simple Multitude, no less variable than contrary to it self, the Faith of Men will soon after die away by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which distraction gave a great Prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran, Si me adjungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab aliis; si me aliis adjungo, à vobis condemnor; Quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo; If I adjoyn my self to you, I am condemned by others; if I joyn with others, I am condemned by you; What I should avoid I see, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II.

The Offerings of the twelve Princes: The Passover of the second year: The departing of Jethro.

NOW when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the service of God, written the Laws, numbred his Army, and divided them into the Battels and Troops before-remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts: The twelve Princes or Commanders of the Num. 6. Tribes, brought their Offerings before the Lord, to wit, six covered Chariots, and twelve Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto: the Sanctuary excepted; which for reverence was carried upon the Shoulders of the Sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots in which were conveyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Levites for that service, namely to the Sons of Gershan and Merari.

Besides these Chariots each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered unto God, and for his service in the Temple, a Charger of fine Silver, weighing 130. Shekles: a Silver Boll of 70. Shekles: after the Shekle of the Sanctuary: and an Incense-Cup of Gold of ten Shekles: which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated unto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards their Conquest: besides the Beasts which they offered for Sacrifice, according to the Law Ceremonial, the weight of all the twelve Silver Chargers, and twelve Silver Bolls, amounted unto 2400. Shekles of Silver: and the weight of Gold in the Incense-Cups, to 120. Shekles of Gold: which makes of Shekles of Silver 1200. every Shekle of Gold valuing ten of Silver, so that the whole of Gold and Silver which they offered at this time, was about four hundred and twenty pound Sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest by the Spirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the Passover: which they performed on the fourteenth day of the second month of the second year: and on the 20. day of the same the Cloud was lifted up from above the Tabernacle, as a sign of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this invocation to God, Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, fly before thee. Then all the People of Israel removed from their incamping at the foot of the Mountain Sinai, towards Paran the Army, or great Squadron of Juda, led by Naasshon, taking the Vantguard, followed by Nethaneel, and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon: after whom the rest marched, as in the figure expreſt. And because the passage through so many Desarts and Mountains, was exceeding difficult: Moses leaving nothing unforethought which might serve for the advancement of his enterprize, he instantly intreated his Father-in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journy towards Canaan: promising him such part and profit of the enterprize, as God should bestow on them: for this Man as he was of great understanding and judgment (as appeared by the Counsel he gave to Moses for the appointing of Judges over the People) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himself inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a Man of great years and experience, for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Ægypt, and married his Daughter: which was 42. years before this request made. And though Moses himself had lived 40. years in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to travel: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a Multitude of Souls, which could not be so few as a Million: it was necessary to use many guides and many Conductors. To this request of Moses it may seem by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, yielded not: for it is evident that he went back from Moses into his own Country. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the Posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites: it is most likely that this his return to his own Country was rather to fetch away his Family: and to take his leave of his own Country, by setting things in order, than to abide there.

The Hebrew Gerah weigheth sixteen Grains: so a Gerah of Silver is about three half pence Sterling: the Sicle of the Sanctuary (as it is expounded Exod. 30. 13.) containeth 20. Gerahs, so a Sanctuary Sicle of Silver is about 7. Groats: the common Sicle is but half so much, to wit, ten Gerahs: as it is usually expounded: though Villalpandus labours to prove that the common and the Sanctuary Sicle were all one.

§. III.

§. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning back to the Red Sea.

AFter this dismission of Hobab, Israel began to march towards the Desarts of Paran: and after three days wandring, they sate down at the Sepulchers of Lust, afterward called Tabeera, or Incensio: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutiners and Murmurers, which rose up in this remove, which happened about the 23. day of the same Month. And from this 23. day of the second month, of the second year, they rested and fed themselves with Quails (which it pleased God by a Sea-wind to cast upon them) to the 24. day of the third Month, to wit, all the Month of Sivan or June: whereof surfeiting there died great numbers: from whence in the following Month, called Thamus, answering to our July, they went on to Hazeroth: where Miriam the Sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued upon her seven days, after whose recovery Israel removed toward the border of Idumæa: and incamped at Rithma, near Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelve discoverers into the Territory of Canaan: both to inform themselves of the fertility and strength of the Country: as also to take knowledge of the Ways, Passages, Rivers, Fords and Mountains. For Arad King of the Canaanites surprised divers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush near those ways: through which the discoverers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now after the return of the discoverers of Cades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel; whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliverance from the Ægyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wilderness (for so Moses calleth it) with the victory which he gave them against the powerful Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that he led them on and preserved them, but to bring them, their Wives, and Children to be slaughtered, and given for a prey and spoil to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported unto them, by the searchers of the Land, That the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles: that many of the people were Giant-like (for they confest that they saw the Sons of Anac there) who were Men of fearful stature, and so far overtopped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grashoppers in their respect. Now as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to choose them a Captain (or as they call it now-a-days, an Electo) to carry them back again into Ægypt: so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished every Soul of the whole multitude (Joshua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then near it, and at the Mountain foot of Idumæa: which is but narrow, laying before them the fertility thereof: and assuring them of victory. But as Men, whom the passion of fear had bereaved both of reason and common sense: they threatned to stone these encouragers to death: accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the lives, goods, and Children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the fear of his bright glory between the unadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his Servants, preserved them thereby from their violence: threatning an intire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercileſs pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God delivered them from the slavery of the Ægyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all Men) prayed unto God to remember his infinite mercies: alledging that this so severe a judgment, how deservedly soever inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations: and give them occasion to vaunt that the God of Israel failing in power to perform his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitless Desarts. Yet as God is no less just than merciful, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire: the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand less heavy than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity, so by the measure of his glory (evermore jealous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to pass unpunished; reserving his compassion for the innocent: whom because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preserve, and in them to perform his promises, which have never been frustrate.

§. IV.

Of their unwillingness to return: with the punishment thereof, and of divers accidents in the return.

NOW when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the people: and made them know his heavy displeasure towards them: they began to bewail themselves, though over-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, having also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his merciful sufferings; They would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrary again to the advice of Moses: who assured them; that God was not now among them: and that the Ark of his Covenant should not move, but by his direction, who could not err: and that the enemies sword which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no less sharp than death: and in the Hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no less cruel. But as Men from whom God hath with-drawn his grace, do always follow those counsels which carry them to their own destructions: so the Hebrews after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered: and might then have entred Judæa before their enemies were prepared and joyned: did afterward, contrary to Gods commandment, undertake the enterprise of themselves: and ran headlong and without advice into the Mountains of Idumæa. There the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joyned and attending their advantage; set on them, brake them: and of their numbers ſlaughtered the greateſt part: and following their victory and purſuit, conſumed them all the way of their flight even unto Hormah: the Amalekites in revenge of their former loſs, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their diſplantation and deſtruction threatned. Of which powerful aſſembly of thoſe two Nations (aſſiſted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings joyned together for their common ſafety) it pleaſed God to forewarn Moſes, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to return by thoſe painful paſſages of the Deſarts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the red Sea again: in which retreat before they came back to paſs over Jordan there were conſumed 38. years: and the whole number of the ſix hundredth and odd thouſand, which came out of Ægypt (Moſes, Joſhua and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wilderneſs, the ſtubborn and careleſs generations were wholly worn out, and the promiſed Land beſtowed on their Children: which were increaſed to 600000. and more. For beſides the double fault both of refuſing to enter the Land upon the return of the diſcoverers, and the preſumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it ſeemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worſhipping Moloch, and the Hoſt of Heaven. For although Moſes doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and ſo doth the Martyr Stephen, as alſo that the Iſraelites worſhipped the Sun and Moon in after-times it is proved out of ſundry other places.

Amos c. 5. v. 25. Act. c. 7. v. 42. 2. Kings c. 17. v. 16. & cap. 21. v. 3. & c. 23. v. 4 5, 11. 2. Chro. c. 33. v. 3. Hierem. c. 19. v. 13. &c.

Now after the broken companies were returned to the Camp at Cades, Moſes, according to the commandment received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the ſhoars of the Red Sea. And ſo from Cades or Rithma he removed to Remmonparez, ſo called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and divided among them. From thence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the frankincenſe there found. From Libnah he croſt the valley, and ſate down at Reſſa near the foot of the mountain. And after he had reſted there, he bended towards the Weſt, and incamped at Ceelata: where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken Wood on the Sabbath, was ſtoned to death. After which, Moſes always keeping the valley, between two great ledges of Mountains (thoſe which bound the Deſart of Sin, and thoſe of Pharan) croſt the ſame from Ceelata; and marched Eaſtward to the Mountain of Sapher, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth manſion. From thence he paſſed on to Harada; then to Maceloth; and then to Thahah; and ſo to Thara or Thare: the four and twentieth manſion. Where while Moſes reſted, the people began that inſolent and dangerous mutiny, of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram: who for their contempt of God and his Miniſters were ſome of them ſwallowed up alive, and by the earth opening her Mouth devoured, others even two hundred and fifty which offered incenſe with Korah were conſumed with fire from Heaven; and 14700. of their party, which murmured againſt Moſes, ſtricken dead with a ſudden peſtilence: one of the greateſt marvails and judgements of God, that hath been ſhewed in all the time of Moſes his government, or before. For among ſo great a multitude, thoſe lay-Men who would have uſurped Eccleſiaſtical authority, were ſuddenly ſwallowed up alive into the earth with their families and goods; even while they ſought to overthrow the Order, Diſcipline, and power of the Church, and to make all Men alike therein, rebelliouſly contending againſt the High Prieſt and Magiſtrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church and Common-weal of his people. And the better to aſſure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleaſed him in this place alſo to approve by miracle the former election of his Servant Aaron, by the twelve rods given in by the Heads of the twelve Tribes; of which Moſes received one of every Head and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dry Wands, and on every rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron's on that of Levi; it pleaſed God, that the rod of Aaron received by his power a vegetable Spirit, and having lain in the Tabernacle of the Congregation before the Ark one night, had on it both Buds, Bloſſoms, and ripe Almonds.

Num. 33.

From Tharah the whole Army removed to Methra; and thence to Eſmona; and thence to Moſeroth, (or Maſurit after S. Hierome) and from Moſeroth to Benejacan: and ſo to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth Manſion; where from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, between Madian and Aſion-gaber.

Now although it be very probable, that at Aſion-gaber, where Salomon furniſhed his Fleets for the Eaſt India, there was ſtore of freſh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River, in Arabia the Stony, which he calleth Corys, from whence (ſaith he) the Inhabitants conveigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Army of Cambyſes: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding theſe Springs at Gadgad, or Jetabata; being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Manſion. For it was at Punon; that thoſe Springs are ſpoken of, which in Deut. the 10. v. 7. is alſo called Jetabata, or Jotbath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adjoyning. And that theſe Springs ſhould fall into the Red Sea at Aſion-gaber, or Eloth, I cannot believe, for the way is very long. And this I find in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of freſh water in thoſe ſandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their courſe for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirſty ſand, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea.

Her. l. 3.

From Jetabata, Moſes directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebrona; and from thence to Eſion-gaber: which City in Joſephus's time had the name of Berenice; and in Hierome's, Eſſia. From thence keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded: Eſion-gaber being the fartheſt place towards the South-eaſt, that Moſes travailed in that paſſage.

Deut. 2.

It ſeemeth that Eſion-gaber or Aſion-gaber, Eoloth and Madian were not at this time in the poſſeſſion of the Kings of Edom. For it is ſaid, That the Lord ſpake unto Moſes and Aaron in the Mount Hor, near the Coaſt of the Land of Edom; ſo as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumæa. And if Eſion-gaber, and the other places near the Red Sea, had at this preſent been ſubject to the Idumæans, Moſes would alſo have demanded a free paſſage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumæans obtained thoſe places: for it is ſaid, And they

Num. c. 20. v. 23.

they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran; and took men with them; which were those companies that followed young Adad of Idumæa into Ægypt, when he fled from Joab. Likewise it is said of Salomon, that he made a Navy of Ships in Esion-gaber besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom. 1 Kings 11. 18.

§. V.

Of Moses's arrival at Zin Kades: and the accidents while they abode there.

FRom Esion-gaber he turned again towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh: or in Beroth, of the Children of Jacan; where they sate down in the first Month of the fortieth year after they left Ægypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Month of the fortieth year: the nine and thirtieth year taking end at Esion-gaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or near it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moses's Sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seen in Saint Hierome's time, as himself avoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountain Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of Water. For neither the punishments by Fire from Heaven; by being devoured and swallowed up by the Earth; by the suddain Pestilence which often seised them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the love or wrath of God, could prevail with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in every of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for help and relief at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea though they well knew that their own Fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in sight of the Land promised, they again as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rock adjoyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattle were satisfied. Nevertheless, because God perceived a kind of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place: therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised; whereto perchance their Worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to end the travails of Aaron at the Mountain Hor, being the next, and four and thirtieth Station. At which Mountain of Hor, Aaron was despoiled of the Garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his Son, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountain; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seen. Num. 20. 1. Num. 20. 3. Num. 20. 9. 2553.

Of this Mountain called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deuter. 10. vers. 6. those Horites took name, which the Idumæans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seven and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the four and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places; because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Esion-gaber, incamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hesmona, and before he came to Benjaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came unto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses's Sister died; the first being the seven and twentieth, and the second being the four and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should have been written, Hor juxta Mosera; Hor near Mosera: for it is but one root of a Mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses incamped, as he past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as he went back again North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceive. Num. 33.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent Messengers to the Prince of Idumæa, praying him that he might pass with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neerest way of all other from the City of Kadesh, where Moses then incamped; whereas otherwise taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, he might have run into many hazards in the passage of those Rivers, the far way about, and through many powerful Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumæa hereunto, Moses remembred him, that he was of the same race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of Brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the Sons of one Father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that he had more reason to favour and respect them, than he had to assist the Canaanites; against whom Esau his Ancestor had made War, and driven out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his own name Edom, or Edumea. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that he would no way offend his people, or wast his Country, but that he would restrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high ways, paying money for whatsoever he used, yea even for the water, which themselves or their Cattle should drink. For Moses was commanded by God not to provoke the Children of Esau. But the King of Edumæa knowing the strength of his own Country, the same being near Canaan, rampard with high and sharp mountains: and with all suspecting, as a natural wise Man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Country, it would rest in their wills to give him Law, resolvedly refused them passage, and delivered this answer to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a denial might satisfy or exasperate, he gathered the strength of his country together, and shewed himself prepared to defend their passage. For as it is written: Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the end of his enterprise was not the conquest of Seir or Edumæa, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like unto himself, who was of a natural understanding the greatest of any Man, and the skilfullest Man of Deut. 2. 4. Num. 20. 20. & 21. Num. 20.

War that the World had, he refuſed to adventure the Army of Iſrael againſt a Nation, which being overcome, gave but a paſſage to invade others; and which by reaſon of the ſeat of their mountainous Country, could not but have endangered, or (at leaſt greatly enfeebled the ſtrength of Iſrael, and rendred them leſs able, if not altogether powerleſs, to have conquered the reſt.

§. VI.

Of their compaſſing Idumæa and travailing to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumæa, turned himſelf towards the Eaſt, and marched towards the Deſarts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites underſtood, and that Moſes had blanched the way of Edumæa; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom which Iſrael aimed at, he thought it ſafeſt, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Country, than to be found by them in his own: which he might have done with a far greater hope of victory, had Moſes been enforc'd firſt to have made his way by the ſword through Idumæa, and thereby, though victorious, greatly have leſſened his numbers. But though it fell out otherwiſe than Arad hoped for, yet being reſolved to make trial, what courage the Iſraelites brought with them out of Ægypt, before they came nearer his own home, leading the ſtrength of his Nation to the edge of the Deſart, he ſet upon ſome part of the Army; which, for the multitude, occupied a great ſpace, and for the many herds of Cattle that they drave with them, could not incamp ſo near together, but that ſome quarter or other was ever-more ſubject to ſurpriſe. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he ſlew ſome few of the Iſraelites, and carried with him many priſoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predeceſſour, which joyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to thoſe mutinous Iſraelites, which without direction from God by Moſes would have entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it ſeemeth that the greateſt number of that Army were of the Canaanites, becauſe in the firſt of Deuter. 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are ſaid to have beaten the Iſraelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the ſame that had a victory over Iſrael near Cadesbarne, or if it were his Predeceſſour that then prevailed, this Man finding that Moſes was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was firſt to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moſes's purpoſe to compaſs Moab, determined while he was yet in the Deſart to try the quarrel. And whereas it followeth in the third verſe of the twelfth chapter of Numbers, that the Iſraelites utterly deſtroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much miſtaken that think, that this deſtruction was preſently performed by the Iſraelites. But it is to be underſtood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Joſhua. For had Moſes at this time entred Canaan in the purſuit of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the Deſarts of Zin and Moab, and have fetcht a wearisome and needleſs compaſs, by the Rivers of Zared and Arnon.

Num. 14. 45.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it ſelf, but that his Territory lay without it, and near the Mountain Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom. Num. 33. 40.

Again, Horma (for ſo far the Iſraelites after their victory purſued the Canaanites) is ſeated in the South of Judæa. There is alſo a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no ſuch place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the Mutiny which followed preſently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to prove, that the ſame was obtained in the future, and in Joſhua his time, and not at the inſtant of Arad's aſſault. For had the Iſraelites at this time ſackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of Water and Bread. For where there are great Cities, there is alſo Water, and Bread. But it was in the time of Joſhua, that the Iſraelites took their revenge, and after they had paſt Jordan: Joſhua then governing them; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verſe, nameth this Arad by the name of his City ſo called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Iſraelites purſued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongſt thoſe Kings, which he vanquiſhed and put to death.

Now after this aſſault and ſurpriſe by Arad, Moſes finding that all entrance on that ſide was defended, he led the people Eaſtward to compaſs Idumæa and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the poſſeſſion of the Amorites. But the Iſraelites, to whom the very name of a Deſart was terrible, began again to rebel againſt their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whoſe venome inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their errour, and afterward, according to his plentiful grace cured them again by their beholding an artificial Serpent, by his Commandment ſet up.

From the Mount Hor, Moſes leaving the ordinary way which lieth between the Red Sea, and Cœleſyria, incamped at Zalmona: and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the Braſen Serpent; making theſe journies by the edge of Edumæa, but without it. For Phunon was ſometime a principal City of the Edomites Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verſ. 4. That From Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the People, it was not thereby meant that the Iſraelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonſeca) per viam, qua habet à latere mare rubrum; By the way that ſided the Red Sea, but indeed they croſt, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Trachonitis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that is, to Eſion-gaber; Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, ſo Iſrael to ſhun the Border of Edom, and to take the utmoſt Eaſt part of Moab, croſt the common way towards the Eaſt, and then they turned again towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adjoyning to the Land of Suph, a country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountains so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East Border of Moab; From whence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riseth in the Mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not far from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having past that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad, and from thence they kept the way to Diblathaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Jeremy the Prophet Chap. 48. Vers. 22. calleth the House of Diblathaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River of Arnon, and incamped in the Mountains of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblathaim, but speaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the Border of Moab, between them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Country at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the Border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: even from the Predecessour of Balac Peor then reigning. From Diblathaim, Moses sent Messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a Passage through his Country: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to give a Reason to the Neighbour Nations, of the War he undertook. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no Warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending Messengers to Sehon observed the same Precept, which he left to his Posterity, and Successours, for a Law of the War, namely in Deut. 20. Vers. 10. in these words, When thou comest near unto a City to fight against it, thou shalt offer it Peace, which if it do accept of and open unto thee, then let all the People found therein be Tributaries unto thee, and serve thee, but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the Males thereof with the edge of the Sword. Which Ordinance all Commanders of Armies have observed to this day, or ought to have done.

§. VII.

Of the Book of the Battels of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Books mentioned in Scripture which are lost.

Num. c. 21. vers. 14. NOW concerning the War between Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to refer a great part of this Story to that Book entituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The Book of Goa's Battels; and therefore passeth over many Encounters; and other things memorable, with greater brevity in this place. His words after the Geneva Translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the Book of the Battels of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar Copy differeth not in sense from this: But the Greek Septuagint vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect, For thus it is said in the Book: the War of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the Brooks of Arnon. Junius for the Red Sea, which is in the Genevan and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of * Suph, a Country bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he conjectureth. The Text he readeth thus. Idcirco dici solet in recensione bellorum Jehovæ, contra Vahebum in Regione Suph: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore is it spoken in repeating of the Battels of Jehovah; against Vaheb in the Country of Suph: and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words he understands, that amongst the Wars which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous Memory in the mouth of most Men, concerning the War of Sehon against Vaheb the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Country near Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate Predecessor of Balac, who lived with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the Son of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. For it seems (as it is plain in the Succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdoms were Elective and not Successive. And as Junius in this Translation understandeth no special Book of the Battels of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any special Book be meant; and if any; whether it be not a Prediction of Wars in future Ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the Book of Judges. Siracides cap. 46. tells us plainly, that those Battels of the Lord were fought by Joshua. Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the Battels of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often pass over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Books, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a Book as this there was; wherein the several Victories by Israel obtained, and also Victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with Divine Discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the Books of Henoch, howsoever they have been in later Ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembred in an Epistle of Thaddæus, and cited by Origen περὶ ἀρχῶν, and by Tertullian.

1 Chron. Cap. 1.

That Work also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Books remembred by Joshua, chap. 10. vers. 13. and in the second of Samuel, chap. 1. vers. 18. called the Book of Jasher, or Justorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sun and Moon in the middest of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still, till Israel had avenged themselves of their Enemies: out of which also David took the Precept of teaching the Children of Juda, to exercise their Bows against their Enemies.

Some think this to be the Book of eternal Predestination, in which the just are written, according to the 69. Psalm, vers. 28. where it is said, Let them be put out of the Book of Life, neither let them be written with the Righteous. Hierom thinks, that David by this Book understood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the Books of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; others, that it was the Book of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary upon Joshua by an unknown Author.

Hieron. in quæst. super lib. Regum.

The Book of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembred in the second of Chron. 33. vers. 18, & 19. Of this Book, also lost, Hierom conceives that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

Heron. in annot. in Paralip.

The same mischance came as well to the Story of Salomon, written by Ahia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the Son of Salomon:

mon: as to the Books of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Jeedo the Seer, remembred in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. with these have the Books of Shemaiah and of Iddo, remembred in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Jehu the Son of Hanani, of the acts of Jehoshaphat, cited in the second of Chron. c. 20. v. 34. Also that Book of Salomon's which the Hebrews write Hasirim, of 5000. verses, of which that part called Canticum Canticorum only remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this divers other of Salomon's works have perished, as his Book of the Natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembred by Origen, Josephus, Hierom, Cedrenus, Cicius Asculanus, Picus Mirandula, and others.

Of these and other Books many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Jerusalem. But let us return thither where we left.

§. VIII.

Of Moses his sparing the Issue of Lot: and of the Giants in those parts: And of Sehon and Og.

WHen Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nebo, leaving the City of Midian on his left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South side of Arnon, having lost all his ancient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to Battel, God having given that Land to the Children of Lot; The same which was anciently possest by the Emims, who were Men of great Stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the Sons of Anac.

Deut. 2. v. 9. & 10. 11. & 12.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: Who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, even to the Desart of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East side of the Mountains of Gilead, were inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time pass those Mountains to the East of Basan, but left their Country to them, as in the Description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the Flood: So these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the Border of Canaan, and the Land it self, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbah, which Arbah in Joshua is called the Father of the Anakims; and the greatest Man of the Anakims. There had also been Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: And their chief City was Aroer or Ar, near the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same ancient Canaanites: And their chief City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendique Gigantes; Strong Men, and fearful Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Province, and not far to the North of Aroer.

Josh. 15. v. 13. c. 14. v. 15.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Country, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former Conquest upon Vaheb the Moabite, which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as Strangers and Usurpers, (themselves being of the Sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withal prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses incamped in the Country of his new Conquests, to wit, the Plains of Moab; the two and fortieth and last Mansion: Which Moses wasted with the multitude of his People and Cattle. Towards him therefore hasting himself, they encountred each other at Jahaz: Where Sehon with his Children and People were broken and discomfited: And the Victory so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Essebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the Race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were: and descended of Emoreus or Amoreus: For Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judea: being at this time, and after this Victory at the Banks of Jordan: yet knew it to be perilous to leave so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his Back, as inhabited all the Region of Basan or Traconitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og: a person of exceeding strength and Stature: and the only Man of mark remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defenced: lying between the Mountain of Hermon (which Mountain saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Basan (who attended Moses's coming at Edrei) as it did unto Sihon; for he and his Sons perished, and all his Cities were taken and possest. After this Moses with-drawing himself back again to the Mountains of Abarim, left the prosecution of that War unto Jair the Son of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdom of Argob, even unto the Nations of the Gessuri and Machati, 60. walled Cities: called the same after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which Conquests afterward the half Tribe of Manasse possest the North part as far as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sihon the Amorite, with the Mountains of Gilead adjoyning, was given to Ruben and Gad.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moses his death.

AFter these Victories, and while Israel sojourned in the Valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it seemeth that Balac King of the Moabites then commanded in chief) sought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their Daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their own interest against them, as also to beat them out of Moab, and the Countries adjoyning. The Israelites as they had ever been inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these evil courses, and thereby drew on themselves the plague of Pestilence, whereof there perished 24000. persons: besides which punishment of God the most of the the Offenders among the Hebrews, were by his com-commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the Son of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi a Daughter of one of the chief of the Midanites, the Plague ceased, and Gods Wrath was appeased. For such was the love and kindness of his all-powerfulness, respecting the ardent zeal of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews became an Idolater) as he forgave the rest of Israel, and staied his hand for his sake.

Num. 26. v. 51. In this Valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able Men fit to bear Arms, 601730. of which as his last enterprise, he appointed 12000. to be chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that sought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worship of the true God, to the service of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which Companies of 12000 Moses gave the charge to Phineas, the Son of Eleazar the high Priest: Num. 31. v. 8. who slew the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the Vassals of Sehon, as Jos. 13. v. 21. appeareth by Joshua. These five Princes of the Midianites slain by Eleazar were at this time but the Cap. 13. 21 Vassals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba the Dukes of Sehon, saith Joshua. He slew also all the Men, Male-children, and Women; saving such as had not yet used the company of Men, but those they saved and dispersed them among the Children of Israel to serve them.

Deut. 31. v. 2. And Moses having now lived 120. years, making both his own weakness of Body known to the People, and his unability to travel: And also that he was forewarned of his end by the spirit of God: from whom he received a new Commandment to ascend the Mountains of Abarim, and thereon to render up his Life: He hastned to settle the Government in Joshua: whom he perswaded with most lively arguments to prosecute the Conquest begun, assuring him of Gods favour and assistance therein. And so having spent these his latter days after the Conquest of Og and Sehon, King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law (or an iteration of the Law, according to S. Augustin) using both arguments, prayers, and Aug. l. 4. de Mirab. sacr Script. threats unto the people: which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirm them in knowledge, Love, Fear, and Service, of the all-powerful God: Deut. 33. He blessed the twelve Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with several and most comfortable Blessings: Praising the Greatness and Goodness of him, unto whom in his Prayers he commended them: He also commanded the Priests to lay up the Book of the Law, by the side of the Ark of God: The Deut. 32. v. 6. last that he indited was that Prophetical Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heavens and I will speak, and let the Earth hear the word of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrows of this Life, unto that rest which never afterward hath disquiet, Deut. 34. v. 6. he was buried in the Land of Moab, over against Beth-peor: but no Man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day, which happened in the year of the World 2554.

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW let us a little, for instruction, look back to the occasions of sundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore choice of this People) he wrought in all things else by the medium of Mens affections, and natural appetites. And so we shall find that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrews, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next natural cause of the sorrows and loss, which befel himself, and the Ægyptian Nation: which numbers when he sought by cruel and ungodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the Male-children of the Hebrews to be slain, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and salvage craft of mortal Men) moved compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's own Daughter, to preserve that Child, which afterward became the most wise, and of all Men the most gentle and mild, the most excellently Learned in all Divine and Humane knowledge, to be the Conductor and deliverer of his oppressed Brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he sought by the strength of his Men of War, of his Horse and Chariots, to tread them under and bury them in the dust. The grief which Moses conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own presence, moved him to take revenge of the Ægyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatning him to discover the slaughter of the Ægyptian, moved him to fly into Midian: the contention between the Shepherds of that place, and Jethro's Daughters, made him known to their Father: who not only entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father-in-laws Sheep, far from the press of the World, contenting himself (though bred as a Kings Son) with the lot of a poor Herds-man, God found him out in that Desart, wherein he first suffered him to live many years, the better to know the ways and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his Will and Divine Pleasure for his return into Ægypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seem unto Men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence: but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many years after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Ægypt; and of the Men of renown in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Joshua, with the summ of the History of Joshua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have War, were divers ways, as it were, prepared to be their Enemies.

IN like manner if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Ægypt, had to do, either in the Wilderness, or afterward: we shall find them long before hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the Issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham: and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ismaelites) were mingled with them by mutual Marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued Strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the Mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same Mountains continued as far as the Springs of Arnon on the East; by the way of Ægypt, and the Red Sea on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the Sons of Cham, the other from Sem: But those of Sem, were but as Strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and Possessors of those Territories: By process of time divided into several Families and Names: whereof some of them were of eminent Stature and Strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzei, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as Men most valiant and able commonly do) did inhabit the utter Borders and Mountains of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Jebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Hetites, and others, who took name after the Sons of Canaan, and after whom the Country in general was still called.

As for the Hebrews which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Family, and Strangers in that Country: especially the Israelites, and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them: no more than the Philistims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himself being a Stranger was highly esteemed and honoured among them: especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now even they which descending from Abraham, or from his Kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites: as holding them Strangers and Intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the Issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity: than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his Kindred, who had linked themselves and matched with the Canaanites and others, had so far possest themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Esau the Idumæans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael, the eldest Son of Abraham came the Ismaelites, with whom are joyned as of the same Nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to have been a tribe of Edom, because Esau had a Grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason convinceth it to have been otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endless War decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere. Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismael's eldest Son Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petræa, called Nabathei. Now even as Abraham besought God to bless Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and perform it. For of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land between Havilah upon Tigris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desart of Arabia Petræa. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great: yet it is not unlikely but that some reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of fear: because all Princes and States do not willingly permit any Stranger or powerful Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so united, in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for Dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood a-part or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to joyn themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so malitiously and resolvedly as the Canaanites did. For the Edumæans only denyed the Hebrews a passage: which the Moabites durst not deny: because their Country lay more open; and because themselves had lately been beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites their Country lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong by reason of the Mountains which divided it from Basan. Again, that which moved the Moabites in their own reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the Conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his Confederate: was that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plains lying between the Mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as soon as Sehon was slain,

* It seemeth also that Hus, the Son of Nachor, and Buz his Brother, planted themselves in the East-side of Jordan about Basan: where they find the Land of Hus: in which both Job dwelt, as one of the Issue of Hus the Son of Nachor, and Elihu, his friend, which is called a Buzite. See hereafter Chap. 10. §. 7.

slain, and that the King of Moab, Balac, perceived that Moses allotted that Valley to the Tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the Daughters of Midian, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry. And thus at length the Moabites by special occasion were more and more stirred up to enmity against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abraham's Kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authors of their Pedigrees, God permitted some enmity to be as it were presages of future Quarrels, which in the Posterity might be the easier incensed by the memory of old Grudges: and withall by some disdain from the elder in Nature to the younger. For the Ishmaelites being descended from the eldest Son of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest Son of Isaac, Jacob being but a second Son of a second Brother, those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses being natural Men, might scorn to give place, much less to subject themselves to their Inferiours, as they took it; and for a more aggravation, the Issues of Esau, Princes of Idumea, might keep in Record that their Parent

Gen. 33. 14. mised, unto Seir, or Idumea.

So also in the Posterity of Ishmael, it might remain as a seed, or pretence of enmity, that their forefather was by the instigation of Sarah, cast out into the Desert, with his Mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieve them. Ishmael also had an Egyptian both to his Mother and to his Wife: and Amalek was also an Horite by his Mother; which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumeans also, or Edomites, were by their maternal line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau took two Wives of that Nation: one of them was Adah the Daughter of Elon the Hittite, and the other Aholibamah the Grandchild of Zi-
Gen. 36. beon the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name Edom, or Idumea.

Lastly; It appears that all those Families of the Ishmaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in process of time corrupted, and drawn from the Knowledg and Worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those People among whom they dwelt, and by those Wives of the Canaanites which they had married; only a few of the Kenites, and those Midianites which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and ever-living God.

§ II.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Midianites, mentioned in the ancient Wars of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedeck may be thought to be of a better Pedegree) we find four named by Moses; and thirty one remembred by Joshua, tho few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities over which they commanded; to which each of them had a small Territory adjoyning, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a general consideration are to be understood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Hevites, &c. and so here we understand this Name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Country of their Habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of Promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principal Families should be rooted out: and that his own People should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the Name and Nation in particular, then is their proper Habitation bounded by Jordan on the East, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: in which narrow Country, and in the choicest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternal Name, chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor, or Hemor, of the Hevites, Gen. 34. whom Simeon and Levi slew, together with his Son Sichem, in revenge of their Sister's Ravishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures have remembred, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which surprized Israel, as they incamped in the Wilderness in the edge of Edumea. Num. 21. 1.

The third named, was Sehon, King of Essebon, who before Moses's arrival had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petræa, or Nabathea, and thrust them over Arnon into the Deserts, the same whom Moses overthrew in the Num. 21. 24. Plains of Moab; at which time he took Essebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

Presently after which Victory, Og was also slain Jos. 9. Joseph. ant. by Israel, who commanded the North part of that lib. 2. c. 5. Valley between the Mountains Traconi, or Gulaad, and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites. Nu. 21. 35.

The fifth was Adonizedek, King of the Jebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Joshua nameth four other Kings.

Hoham, King of Hebrom.
Piram, King of Jarmuth.
Japia, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon: who were all Amorites, Josh. 10. overthrown in Battel, and hanged by Joshua. Af- Joseph. ant. ter this overthrow, Joshua nameth Jabin, King of lib. 5. c. 2. Hazor, and Jobab, King of Madon; whom he also slaughtered, and took his Cities: and this Jabin seemed to have some Dominion over the rest, for it is said in the Text, For Hazor before times was the Josh. 11. Head of all those Kingdoms. 10.

After these Adonibezek that notorious Tyrant is named; who confest that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands, and feet of 70 Kings, inforcing them to gather crumbs under his Table: who after Juda and Simeon had used the same ex- Jud. 1. ecution upon himself, acknowledged it to be a Joseph. lib. just revenge of God: This King was carried to 5. cap. 2. Hierusalem, where he died.

The last King named is Jabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Joshua. For at such time as he imployed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppresst twenty years, after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, Jud. 4. Barac (incouraged by Debora) overthrew; and his Captain Sisara had by Jael, the Wife of He- Jud. 4. ber the Kenite, a Nail driven into his head while Psal. 83. he slept in her Tent; Jabin himself perishing afterwards in that War.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites; and they Josiph. l. 5. held a corner of Land in Nabathea, to the South- c. 6. East of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abraham's Son by Cethura. Reguel, surnamed Gethegleus or Jethreus, saith Josephus, called Jethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Judges, the Son of Dathan, the Grand-Child of Jucanu, or Exod. 3.

Jokſham, the great Grand-Child of Abraham by Cethura, was Prieſt or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea, whoſe Daughter or Neece Moſes married; and of whom I have ſpoken elſewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the ſame with Hobab, muſt be his Father: and this Hobab had ſeven Daughters. He guided Moſes in the Wilderneſs, and became one of the Iſraelites: of him deſcended the Kenites, ſo called of his Father Raguels ſurname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had Peace with Jabin the ſecond, even now remembred.

After the Death of Barac, Judg of Iſrael, the four laſt named of theſe Madianite Kings, vexed Iſrael ſeven Years: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and ſlain by the Ephraimites, at the paſſage of Jordan, as in the 6th, 7th, and 8th of Judges it is written at large. Afterwards in the purſuit of the reſt, Gideon himſelf laid hands upon Zebah and Salmana, or Salmunna, and executed them, being Priſoners; in which expedition of Gedeon there periſhed 120000 of the Madianites, and their Confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will ſpeak hereafter in the deſcription of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites and Iſhmaelits.

OF the Kings of the Amalekites, and Iſhmaelites, I find few that are named; and tho of the Iſhmaelites there were not more in number than of the reſt (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according to the Promiſe of God made unto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites, were numbred among them, were more renowned in Moſes's time than the reſt of the Iſhmaelites. So alſo were they when Saul governed Iſrael. For Saul purſued them from Sur unto Havilah, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petræa, and the Deſart. The reaſon to me ſeemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Iſhmael, were content to leave thoſe barren Deſarts of Arabia Petræa, called Shur, Paran, and Sin, to the Iſſue of Abraham by Cetura, that joyned with them (for ſo ſeem the Amalekites to have been, and ſo were the Madianites:) themſelves taking poſſeſſion of a better Soil in Arabia the happy, and about the Mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petræa. For Nabaioth, the eldeſt of thoſe twelve Princes, planted that part of Arabia Petræa, which was very fruitful, though adjoyning to the Deſart, in which Moſes wandred, afterward called Nabathea: the ſame which neighboureth Judea on the Eaſt ſide. They alſo peopled a Province in Arabia the happy, whereof the People were in after-times called Napathei, (b) changed into (p).

Kedar, the ſecond of Iſhmael's Sons, gave his own Name to the Eaſt part of Baſan, or Batanea, which was afterwards poſſeſt by Manaſſeh, ſo much thereof as lay within the Mountains Traconh, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Pliny Cedreans.

Adbeel ſat down in the Deſart Arabia, near the Mountains which divided it from the Happy; and gave Name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Mibſam was the Parent of the Maſamanenſes, near the Mountain Zamath, in the ſame Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Miſhma: who joyned to the Orchens, near the Arabian Gulf, where Ptolomy ſetteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumæans, between the Adubens and Raabens: where the City Dumeth ſometimes ſtood.

Of Maſſa the Maſſani; and of Hadar, or Chadar, the Athritæ, who bordered the Napathеans in the ſame Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountains, where alſo the City of Thema is ſeated.

Of Jetur the Ituræans, or Chamathens; of whom Tobu was King in David's time.

Of Naphri, the Nubeian Arabians; inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom Adadezer commanded, whild David ruled Iſrael.

Cadma, the laſt and twelfth of Iſhmael's Sons, was the Anceſtor of the Cadmoneans; who were afterwads called Aſitæ, becauſe they worſhipped the Fire with the Babylonians.

Joſeph.

The Amalekites gave their Kings the Name of Agag, as the Egyptians the Name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians, Adad to theirs, and the Arabian, Nabatheans, Aretas, as Names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the firſt that fought with Moſes, after he paſt the Red Sea; when of all times they flouriſhed moſt, and yet were vanquiſhed.

Afterward they joyned with the Canaanites, and beat the Iſraelites near Cades-barne. After the Government of Othoniel, they joyned them with the Moabites; after Barac with the Madianites, and invaded Iſrael. §. IV.

Of the Instauration of Civility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

THere lived at this time, and in the same Age together with Moses, many Men exceeding famous, as well in bodily Strength, as in all sorts of Learning. And as the World was but even now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civility (bred and fostered far off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discover a Passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Judea. For if Pelasgus, besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those People to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from Rain and Storm: and learned them withal to make a kind of Meal, and Bread of Acorns, who before lived for the most part, by Herbs and Roots: we may thereby judg how poor and wretched those times were, and how falsly those Nations have vaunted of that their Antiquities, accompanied not only with civil Learning, but with all other kinds of Knowledg. And it was in this Age of the World, as both Aug. l. 18. c. 8. de Civit. Dei. Eusebius and St. Augustine have observed, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de luto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientiæ Doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported that he formed Men out of Clay, because he was an excellent Teacher of Wisdom: and so Theophrastus expounded the invention of Fire ascribed to Prometheus, Æschyl. in Prom. vinct. Aug. l. 18. c. 8. de Civit. Dei. Ad inventa spientiæ pertinere; To have reference to wise Inventions: and Æschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Jupiter's Fire was meant, that the Knowledg of Prometheus reached to the Stars, and other Celestial Bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the Art so to use this Fire, as thereby he gave Life to Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his Birth and Being, those People among whom he lived had nothing else worthy of Men, but external form and figure. By that Fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his Entrails the while devoured by an Engle, was meant the inward Care and restless Desire he had to investigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heavenly Bodies, for so it is said: Ideò altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno Cælo quàm longissimè astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret: That he ascended Caucasus, to the end, that he might in a clear Skie discern a far off, the settings and risings of the Stars: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diversly. L. Vives ex Hes.

Of this Man's Knowledg Æschylus gives this Testimony.

Africanus makes Prometheus far more ancient, and but 94 Years after Ogyges. Porphyrius says, that he lived at once with Inachus, who lived with Isaac. Aug. lib. 18. c. 3. de Civit. Dei.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, Brother to Prometheus, both being the Sons of Japetus, of whom though it be said, that they were born before Moses's days, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more antient date: yet the advantage of their long Lives gave them a part of other Ages among Men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these Sons of Japetus; Æschylus finds two other, to wit, Oceanus, and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evening, and so to the Evening-Star. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same Name: but of the Lybian, and the Brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountains which cross Africa, to the South of Morocco, Sus, and Hea, with the Sea adjoyning took name, which Memory Plato in Critias bestows on Atlas, the Son of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan Questions, affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to express Divine Knowledg. Nec verò Atlas sustinere Cœlum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucaso, nec stellatus Cepheus cum Uxore traderetur, nisi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to bear up Heaven, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his Wife to be stellified, unless their divine Knowledg had raised upon their Names these erroneous Fables.

Orpheus sometime expresst Time by Prometheus; sometime he took him for Saturn; as Rheæ conjux alme Prometheu. But that the Story of Prometheus was not altogether a Fiction; and that he lived about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and St. Augustine have not doubted. For the great Judgment which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith St. Augustine, were his Daughters called by the Names of Constellations, Pleiades and Hyades: Others attribute unto him the finding out of the Moon's Course, of which Archas the Son of Orchomenus challengeth the Invention. Of this Archas, Arcadia in Peloponesus took Name, and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moon. Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be understood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any observation of the Moon's Course; or of her working in inferiour Bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacius Tzetzes, a curious searcher of Antiquities, gave it Atlas of Lybia: who, besides his gifts of Mind, was a Man of unequalled and incomparable Strength: Lib. 18. cap. 8. de Civit. Dei. Ovid. de fast. l. 1.

from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaeton.

AND in this Age of the World, and while Moses yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Thessaly, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the Son of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gave him Pandora for Mother, the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odysses makes Deucalion the Son of Minos: but he must needs have meant some other Deucalion; for else either Ulysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the Tale into his Mouth. For Ulysses after his return from Troy feigned himself to be the Brother of Idumeneus, who was Son to this later Deucalion, the Son of Minos: but this Minos lived but one Age before Troy was taken: (for Idumeneus served in that War) and this Deucalion the Son of Prometheus, who lived at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalion's time happened that great Inundation in Thessaly: by which in effect, every Soul in those parts perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his Wife, and some few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this Flood in Thessaly, those People exceeded in all kind of Wickedness and Villany: and as the Impiety of Men is the forcible attractive of God's Vengeance, so did all that Nation, for their foul Sins, perish by Waters: as in the time of Noah, the Corruption and Cruelty of all Mankind drew on them that general Destruction by the Flood Universal. Only Deucalion and Pyrrha his Wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be Lovers of Vertue, of Justice, and of Religion. Of whom Ovid;

Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. 1. & Strabo. lib. 9.

Non ille melior quisquam, nec amantior aqui
Vir fuit: aut illa reverentia ulla Dearum.

No Man was better, nor more just than he:
Nor any Woman godlier than she.

It is also affirmed that Prometheus foretold his Son Deucalion of this overflowing, and advised him to provide for his own Safety; who hereupon prepared himself a kind of Vessel, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these Circumstances, they afterwards add the sending out of the Dove, to discover the Waters fall and decrease, I should verily think that this Story had been but an imitation of Noah's Flood devised by the Greeks, did not the Times so much differ, and S. Augustine, with others of the Fathers, and Reverend Writers approve this Story of Deucalion. Among other his Children, Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen, of whom Greece had first the Name of Hellas; and Melantho, on whom Neptune is said to have begot Delphus, which gave name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen, for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

August. de Civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 10. ex Eusebio & Hieronimo.

And that which was no less strange and marvellous than this Flood, was that great burning and Conflagration which about this time also happened under Phaeton; not only in Æthiopia, but in Istria, a Region in Italy, and about Cumæ, and the Mountains of Vesuvius: of both which the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many strange Fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BUT of all other which this Age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned: the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter maximus: and of the Greeks Hermes.

Many there were of this Name: and how to distinguish, and set them in their own Times, both S. Augustin and Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of Thieves, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Seamen, and the God of Eloquence, (though all by one Name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many Works some Fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greeks reckon five Mercuries: Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the Son of Nilus, whose Name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jews did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercury which slew Argos in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have delivered Literature to the Egyptians, and to have given them Laws. But Diodorus affirms, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought Learning and Letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying, That Letters were not found out by that Mercury which slew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Theut; whom Philo Biblius writeth Taautus; the Egyptians Thoyth; the Alexandrians Thot; and the Greeks (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanconiatho, who lived about the War of Troy, gives the invention of Letters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the Son of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have slain Argus. For he finds this Mercury, the slayer of Argus, to be the Grandchild of that Atlas which lived whilst Moses was yet young. And yet Lod. Vives upon S. Augustine seems to understand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest have remembred. But that Conjecture of theirs, that any Grecian Mercury brought Letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane Antiquity) that all the Knowledge which the Greeks had, was transported out of Egypt, or Phœnicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian, into Egypt. For they all confess that Cadmus brought Letters first into Bœotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that between Mercurius that lived at once with Moses, and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argives, with whom Moses lived, and in whose time about his tenth Year Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus who reigned eleven Years; after him Danaus fifty Years; after him Lynceus; in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought Literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom St. Augustine remembreth, the one the Grandfather, the other the Nephew or Grandchild, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out Letters, Lud. Vives out of Cicero, in Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 8. c. 26.

Euseb. l. 1. c. 6. de Prep. Evang.

Letters, and taught the use of them to the Jews; of whom the Phœnicians their Neighbours received them; and the Greeks of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this Invention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred; that is, because the Jews and the Phœnicians had them first from him. For every Nation gave unto those Men the honour of first Inventors, from whom they received the Profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, upon part of whose Works he commenteth, to have been four Descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calls Atlas, that lived with Moses, the maternal Grandfather of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counsellor and Instructer of that renowned Isis, Wife of Osiris. But Ficinus giveth no reason for his Opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an Inscription was found on a Pillar erected on the Tomb of Isis. Lud. Vives upon the six and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Book of S. Augstine de Civitate Dei, conceiveth that this Mercury, whose Works are extant, was not the first which was entituled, Ter Maximus, but his Nephew or Grand-Child. * Sanchoniaton, an ancient Phœnician, who lived shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturn, and called by the Phœnicians, Taautus; and by the Egyptians Thooth, or Thoyt. It may be, that the many Years which he is said to have lived, to wit, three hundred Years, gave occasion to some Writers to find him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those which have collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophy and Divinity, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inventor of the Egyptian Wisdom, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

Virgil. lib. 4. Æneid. Ficin. in Præfat. Pœmand. Mercurii Trismegisti.

 Or Sanchoniatho. See Euseb. de præp. Evang. lib. 1. c. 6. & 7. Vives in lib. 8. c. 26. Aug. de Civit. Dei.*

It is true, that although this Mercury, or Hermes, doth in his Divinity differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approving of Images, which Moses of all things most detested; yet whosoever shall read him with an even Judgement, will rather resolve that these Works which are now extant, where by the Greeks and Egyptian Priests corrupted, and those Fooleries inserted, than that ever they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his Heart and Spirit devised. For there is no Man of understanding, and Master of his own Wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrary in Doctrine and in Nature. For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was never any Man of those elder Times that hath attributed more, and in a stile more reverend and divine, unto Almighty God than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises, now among us; the one converted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had been found in all things like themselves; I think it had not been perilous to have thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himself; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was devised by the first, and more ancient Mercury, which others have thought to have been Joseph the Son of Jacob; whom, after the exposition of Pharoah's Dreams, they called Saphanet Phane, which is as much as to say, as Abscondicorum Repertor, A finder out of hidden things. But these are over-venturous Opinions. For what this Man was, it is known to God. Envy and aged Time hath partly defaced, and partly worn out the certain knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem divinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus majestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, iisdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; He hath written many Books belonging to, or expressing the knowledg of divine things, in which he affirmeth the Majesty of the most High and one God, calling him by the same names of God, and Father, which we do. The same Father also feareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And so contrary are these his Acknowledgments to those Idolatrous Fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians, as for my self I am perswaded, that whatsoever is found in him contrary thereunto, was by Corruption inserted. For thus much himself confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, Fons & Vita, Potentia & Lux, & Mens, & Spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex ejus esse prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & Generator & Opifex, &c. God (saith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the Fountain, and Life, and Power, and Light, and Mind, and Spirit: and all things are in him and under him. For his Word out of himself proceeding being most perfect, and generative, and operative, falling upon fruitful Nature, made it also fruitful and producing. And he was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate unum esse Deum asserens; Because he spake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. Hic ruinam (saith Ficinus) prævidit priscæ Religionis, hic ortum novæ fidei, hic adventum Christi, hic futurum Judicium, Resurrectionem seculi, beatorum Gloriam, supplicia peccatorum. This Mercury foresaw the Ruin of the old or superstitious Religion, and the Birth of the new Faith; and of the coming of Christ, the future Judgment, the Resurrection, the Glory of the Blessed, and the Torment or Affliction of the wicked or damned.

In Præf. Mercu. Trismeg.

To this I will only add his two last Speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volateran out of Suidas. Hactenus fili pulsus à patria, vixi perigrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto cumq; post paulum à vobis corporeis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtote ne me quasi mortuum lugeatis: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Civitatem regredior; ad quam universi Cives mortis conditione venturi sunt. Ibi namq; solus Deus est summus Princeps: qui Cives suos replet suavitate mirifica; ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita. Hitherto, O Son, being driven from my Country, I have lived a Stranger and banished Man; but now I am repairing home-ward again in safety. And when I shall after a few days (or in a short time) by being loosed from these Bonds of Flesh and Blood depart from you, see that you do not bewail me as a Man dead, for I do but return to that best and blessed City, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of Death) shall repair. Therein is the only God, the most high and chief Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with a sweetness more than marvellous; in regard whereof this being, which others call a Life, is rather to be accounted a Death, than a Life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus converted by others, agreeing in sense, but not in words with Suydas. O Cœlum magni Dei sapiens opus, teq; O vox patris quam ille primam emisit, quando universum constituit mundum, adjuro per unigenitum ejus verbum & Spiritum cuncta comprehendentem, miseremini mei; I adjure thee O Heaven, thou wise Work of the great God, and thee O Voice of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole World, by his only begotten Word and Spirit, comprehending all things, have Mercy upon me.

But Suydas hath his Invocation in these words. Obtestor te Cœlum magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem vocem Patris quam loquutus est primum, cum ommem mundum firmavit, obtestor te per unigenitum Sermonem omnia continentem, propitius, propitius esto. I beseech thee O Heaven, wise Work of the great God, I beseech thee, O Voice of the Father, which he spake first when he established all the World, I beseech thee by the only begotten Word, containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

§. VII.

Of Jannes and Jambres, and some other that lived about those times.

THere were also in this Age both Æsculapius, which after his Death became the God of Physicians, being the Brother of Mercurius, as Vives thinks in his Commentary upon Agustine, de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Jannes and Jambres, who in that impious Art excelled all that ever have been heard of to this day: and yet Moses himself doth not charge them with any Familiarity with Devils, or ill Spirits; words indeed that seldom came out of his Mouth; however by the Septuagint they are called Sophistæ or Venefici and Incantatores, Sophist Poisoners, and Inchanters: By Hierome, sapientes & malefici, wise Men, and Evildoers: and so by Vatablus, who also useth the word Magi. The Greek it self seems to attribute somewhat of what they did to natural Magick; calling them φαρμακους, workers by Drugs. The Genevan, Sorcerers and Inchanters; Junius Sapientes, Præstigiatores & Magi. Magicians and Wise-Men here by him are taken in one sense; and Præstigiators are such as dazel Mens Eyes, and make them seem to see what they see not; as false Colours, and false Shapes. But as some Vertues and some Vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (Religion and Superstition having one Face and Countenance) so did the Works and Workings of Moses, and of Pharaoh's Sorcerers appear in outward shew, and to the beholders of common Capacities, to be one and the same Art and Gift of Knowledg. For the Devil changeth himself into an Angel of Light: and imitateth in all he can the ways and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary, every work which surmounteth the Wisdom of most Men, is not to be condemned as performed by the Help or Ministry of ill Spirits. For the Properties and Powers which God hath given to natural things, as such as where he also bestoweth the Knowledg to understand their hidden and best Vertues, many things by them are brought to pass, which seem altogether impossible, and above Nature or Art: Which two Speculations of Works of Nature, and of Miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these Names; Opus de Beresith, & opus de mercana: the one they call Sapientiam Naturæ, The Wisdom of Nature: The other Sapientiam Divinitatis; The Wisdom of Divinity: The one Jacob practised in the breeding the pied Lambs in Mesopotamia; the other Moses exercised in his Miracles wrought in Egypt; having received from God the Knowledg of the one in the highest Perfection, to wit, the Knowledg of Nature: of the other so far as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he used to his Glory that gave them; assuming to himself nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also S. Augustine noteth that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Josua, divers other famous Men lived in the World, who after their Deaths, for their eminent Vertues and Inventions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Græcians the use of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musical Plays to Apollo Delphicus; thereby to regain his Favour, who brought Barrenness and Scarcity upon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the Attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple and set it on fire: So did Ericthonius institute the like Games to Minerva; wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oil, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Olive.

L. Vives in lib. 8. August. de Civit. Dei. c. 26.

Exod. 9. 11.

In this Age also Xanthus ravished Europa, and begat on her Radamanthus, Sarpedon, and Minos, which three are also given to Jupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules; the same to whom the twelve Labours are ascribed, Native of Tyrinthia a City of Peloponnesus: (or, as others say, only nursed and brought up there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules, according no Philostratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manifestum sit, non Thebanum Herculem, sed Ægyptium ad Gades pervenisse, & ibi finem statuisse Terræ (saith Philostratus:) It is manifest that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the Streights of Gades, and there determined the Bounds of the Earth. In this time also, while Moses wandred in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania.

Lib. De Ci. vit. Dei, cap. 12.

Philost. l. 2.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy soever they were that lived in the Days and Age of Moses, there was never any Man, that was no more than Man, by whom it pleased God to work greater things, whom he favoured more; to whom (according to the appearing of an Infinite God) he so often appeared; never any Man more familiar and conversant with Angels; never any more learned both in Divine and Humane Knowledg; never a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that received and delivered the Law of God entire; the first that left to Posterity by Letters, the Truth and Power of one Infinite God, his creating out of nothing the World Universal, and all the Creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the Punishment, Vengeance, and Eradication which followed it.

Syracides calleth Moses the Beloved of God and Men, whose Remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the fear of his Enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his Glory, caused him to hear his Voice, sanctified him with Faithfulness and Meekness, and chose him out of all Men.

Syrac. 45. 1, 2, 3.

He is remembred among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetick; by Megastenes and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long Lives which the Patriarchs enjoyed before the Flood, remembred by Moses, Estieus, Hieronymus, Ægyptius, Hecataus, Elanicus, Acusilaus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirm. The Universal Flood which God revealed unto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others have testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of Tongues, Abydenus, Estieus, and Sybilla have approved. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecataus wrote a Book of him. Damascenus, before cited, speaketh of Abraham's passage from from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the Books of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very same of Abraham which Moses did. For, beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by Divine Power, he saith that Abraham, born in the tenth Generation, in the City called Camerina, or Urien, excelled all Men in Wisdom; and by whom the Astrology of the Chaldeans was invented. Is justitia pietate, sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Author) sic Deo gratus fuit, ut Divino Præcepto in Phœnicem venerit, ibiq; habitaverit: For his Justice and Piety he was so pleasing unto God, as by his Commandment he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Book and fifth Chapter speaketh reverently of Moses. There are many other among prophane Authors, which confirm the Books of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I refer the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable Testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words. Moses enim affirmabat, docebatque, Ægyptios non rectè sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemq; Afros & Græcos, qui Dijs hominum figuram affixerunt: id verò solum esse Deum, quod nos & Terram & Mare continet, quod Cœlum & Mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cujus profectò imaginem, nemo sanæ mentis, alicujus earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effictione repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constituendum, ac sine ullius figura colendum. Moses affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amiss, which attributed unto God the Images of Beasts and Cattel: Also that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred in giving unto their Gods the shape of Men; whereas that only is God indeed, which containeth both Us, the Earth and Sea, which we call Heaven, the World, and the nature of all things, whose Image doubtless, no wise Man will dare to fashion out unto the likeness of those things which are amongst us; That therefore (all devising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of Prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein. Strab. l. 16.

Now concerning the Egyptian Wisdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the Wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in Works and Words; Act. 7. 22. the same is collected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Judæus, and Eusebius Cæsariensis, and divided into four parts, viz. Mathematical, Natural, Divine, and Moral.

In the Mathematical part, which is distinguished into Geometry, Astronomy, Arithmetick, and Musick, the ancient Egyptians excelled all others. For Geometry, which is by interpretation, measuring of Grounds, was useful unto them, because it consisting of infallible Principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands and Territories, when their Fields and Limits, by the Inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflown and confounded, so as no Man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomy, the site of the Country being a level and spatious Plain, free and clear from Clouds, yeilded them delight with Ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Stars.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledg of Numbers, they studied, because without it, in Geometry and Astronomy, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledg, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnify their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The natural part of this Wisdom, which handleth the Principles, Causes, Elements, and Operations of natural things, differs little from Peripatetical Philosophy; teaching that materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt Bodies and living Creatures have their Being; that Heaven is round like a Globe; that all Stars have a certain fovent Heat, and temperate Influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that Rains proceed and be from mutations in the Air; that the Planets have their proper Souls, &c.

The Divine part of this Wisdom, which is called Theology, teacheth and believeth that the World had a beginning, and shall perish; that Men had their first Original in Egypt, partly by means of the temperateness of that Counrtry, where neither Winter with Cold, nor Summer with Heat, are offensive; and partly through the Fertility that Nilus giveth in those places: That the Soul is immortal, and hath Transmigration from Body to Body: That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sun and Moon, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not known; That many of the Gods have been in the estate of Mortal Men, and after Death, for their Vertues, and benefits bestowed on Mankind, have been deified. That those Beasts, whose Images and Forms the Kings did carry in their Arms when they obtained Victory, were adored for Gods; because under those Ensigns they prevailed over their Enemies. Moreover, the Egyptian Divines had a peculiar kind of writing, mystical and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and Worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clemens distributeth the whole sum of this latter Egyptian Learning into three several sorts, viz. Epistolar, which is used in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds; the one proper, which is expressed by Letters alphabetical in obscure and figurative Words; as for Example, where it is written, The Ibis by the Beetle participateth the Beauty of the Hawk; which is read thus: The Moon doth by the Sun borrow part of the Light of God; because Light is an Image of Divine Beauty. The other symbolical, or by Signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropical, and Anygmatical; Imitative, which designeth things by Characters, like to the things signified; as by a Circle, the Sun; and by the Horns of the Moon, the Moon it self: Tropical or Transferent, which applies the divers forms and figures of Natural Bodies or Creatures, to signify the Dignities, Fortunes, Conditions, Vertues, Vices, Affections, and Actions of their Gods and Men. So with the Egytian Divines, the Image of an Hawk signifieth God; the figure of the Beetle signifieth the Sun; the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moon: by the form of a Man, Prudence and Skilfulness: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse, Liberty; by a Crocodile, Impudency; by a Fish, Hatred is to be understood. Anygmatical, is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes; in which sense, the monstrous Image Clem. Strom. l. 5.

of a Lions Body having a Man's Head, was graven on their Temples and Altars, to signify, that to Men all divine things are Ænygmatical and obscure. So the Image of the Sun set on the head of a Crocodile (which liveth as well in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth, that the Sun nourisheth Meteors in the Air, as well from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Ear, signifieth God, hearing, seeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have been delighted with this kind of writing. For Pherecides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending Letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruin and destruction of his Kingdom, unless he would acknowledg Subjection: Idanthura returned to him a Mouse, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-share; which Orontopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signify, that by the Mouse, their Dwellings; by the Frog, their Waters; by the Bird, their Air; by the Dart, their Weapons; by the Plough, their Lands; were signified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their Soveraign Lord. But Xyphodres made another Construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his Men did hasten away, as a Bird through the Air, or creep into holes as a Mouse, or run into the Waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his Arms, but either be slain, or (being made Captives) till his Grounds. The same History is with little difference reported by Herodotus. Herod. l. 4.

The fourth and last part, which is moral and politique, doth contain especially the Laws, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter maximus divised; who in his Books or Dialogues of Pimander and Asclepius, hath written so many things of God worthy of admiration; as well (saith Sixtus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearful day of Judgment: that (as saith the same Author, the Opinion being also ancient) he is not only to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Book of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menatus, affirmeth, that this Mercury was not only the Inventor of the Egyptian Philosophy, but of all other Learning, called the Wisdom of the Egyptians, before remembred: And that he wrote of that subject 36525 Books, or Pages. Of which there were numbred of fiery Spirits, one hundred Books; of aerial Spirits as many; and of Spirits Celestial a thousand: which because they were out of the Egyptian Language converted by certain learned Philosophers into the natural Greek, they seemed to have been first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Books of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36; of Physick six Books; of the orders of Priests ten; and of Astrology four. Clem. Strom. l. 6.

§. VII.

A Brief of the History of Joshua; and of the space between him and Othoniel; and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Joshua; and of the breach of Faith.

After the Death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth Year of the Egression, in the first Month called Nisan, or March, Joshua the Son of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of Wisdom, took on him the Government of Israel; God giving him Comfort, and encouraging him to pass the River of Jordan, and to possess, and divide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Joshua's Rule, St. Augustine dates with the Reign of Amintas, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicyonia; when Danaus governed the Argives; and Erichthonius Athens. Lib. 18. de Civit. Dei, c. 11.

Joshua, imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent over Jordan certain Discoverers to view the Seat and Strength of Jerico, the next City unto him on the other side of the River, which he was to pass over. Which Discoverers, being saved and sent back by Rahab, a Woman of ill Fame, because she kept a Tavern or Victualing-house, made Joshua know, that the Inhabitants of Jericho, and those of the Country about it, hearing of the approach of Israel, had lost their Courage. Whereupon the day after the return of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth year after the Egression, Joshua removed from Shittim in the Plains of Moab, and drew down his Army to the Banks of the River Jordan, and gave them Commandment to put themselves in order to follow the Ark of God, when the Levites took it up, and moved towards the River; giving them withal this forcible Encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his favour and presence, who is Lord of all the World, when the River of Jordan should be cut off, and divided, and the Waters coming from above should stand still on a heap; whereby those below towards the Dead-Sea wanting supply, they might pass over into the Land of Canaan with dry feet. Josh. 2. 1. Josh. 2. 11. Josh. 3. 1. Josh. 3. 3. Josh. 3. 13.

He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasseh, to prepare themselves (according to their Covenant made with Moses) to march in the Head of the rest, and (as we call it in this Age) to lead in the Vanguard, which through all the Desarts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Judah had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their Habitations, and the Country and Cities of the Amorites, by the help of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with Justice and Equity, that Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manasseh should also assist their Brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their Enemies possession. Josh. 1. 12.

On the Banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first Month Nisan, or March, they pass over to the other side, taking with them twelve Stones from the dry ground in the midst of the River: which, for a memory of that Miracle by God wrought, they set up at Gilgal, on the East-side of the City of Jerico, where they encamped the first Night. At which place Joshua gave Commandment, that all born in the last fortieth Year in the Deserts, should be circumcised; which Ceremony to that day had been omitted. Of the neglect whereof St. Augustine giveth for cause, The Peoples contempt of their Superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That the Israelites knew not the certain time of their removing from one place to another; Damascen, That it was not needful by Circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they lived by themselves and apart from all Nations. Josh. 4. 19. Josh. 5. 2. Aug. q. 3. in Josh. Thom. part 3. quæst. 70. art. 4. ad 3.

On the fourteenth day of the same Month, the Children of Israel celebrated the Passover now the third time; first, at their leaving Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. Josh. 5. 10.

After

After which being desirous to taste of the Fruits of the Country, and having, as it were, surfeited on Manna, they parched of the Corn of the Land, being not yet fully ripe, and eat thereof.

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Land of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sihon held, so did Joshua perform the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gave to each Tribe his Portion by Lot. But this Partition and Distribution was not done at once, but at three several times; First, by Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the half Tribe of Manasseh, of the Lands over Jordan; Secondly, by Joshua, to the Tribe of Judah, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manasseh, about the fifth Year of his Government; proved in the 14th of Joshua, v. 10. and a third division was made to the other seven Tribes at Shilo, where Joshua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

Josh. 14. 3.

Josh. 18.

The Victories of Joshua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own Books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their Repetition. In whose Story I chiefly note these Particulars.

First; How in the beginning of the War, those little Kings, or Reguli of the Canaanites, had not so much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelits; but according to the custom of those Estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all Wisdom and Fore-sight, they left those of their own Nation, which were next the Invaders, to themselves and to their own Defences; hoping that the Fire kindled somewhat far off, might again have been quenched ere it could spread it self so far as their own Territories and Cities. But after such time as Jericho and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed, five of those 31 Kings (all which at length perished in that War) joyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselves to Joshua. Only five (the rest looking on to see the success) namely the King of the Jebusites, in Jebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for Resistance: whose Army being by Joshua surprised and broken, themselves despairing to scape by flight, and hopeless of Mercy by Submission, creeping into a Cave under ground, were thence by Joshua drawn forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which Victory he also took Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the Relief whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Joshua possest himself of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying these Cities with their Princes.

Josh. 10.

Josh. 10.

In the end, and when the South Countries were possest, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made Dust: The rest of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late Counsels of necessity, united themselves, to make one gross strength and body of an Army; which Jabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, being at that time of all the Canaanite Kings the most powerful; which Army being by Joshua discovered, as the same rested near the Lake of Merom, he used such Diligence, as he came on them unawares; and obtaining an absolute Victory over them, he prosecuted the same to the utmost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the Defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor only, reserving the rest for Israel to inhabit and enjoy.

Secondly; I note, that Joshua shewed himself a skilful Man of War, for that in those ancient times he used the Stratagem of an Ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surprise: For he marched all night from his Camp at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day, when they suspected no Enemy at hand; as he did also at Merom, when he overthrew Jabin, and his Confederates. After which, making the best profit of his Victory, he assaulted the great City of Hazor.

Josh. 10. 9.

Thirdly; The Miracles which God wrought during this War, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the River of Jordan at the Springs, so as the Army of Israel past it with a dry foot; the fall of Jericho by the sound of Rams Horns; the showers of Hail-stones which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished, than by the Sword of Israel. Again, the arrest of the Sun in the Firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lengthened as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a work only proper to the All-powerful God.

Josh. 3. 13.

Chap. 10. vers. 11.

Fourthly; Out of the passage between Joshua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all Evasion, it admitteth no Distinction, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousness, and horrible deceit of this latter Age, called Equivocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a People of the Hevites, expressly and by Name, by the Commandment of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were Liars, and Deceivers, and Counterfeits, and that they did overreach, and as it were, deride Joshua, and the Princes of Israel, by faining to be sent as Embassadours from a far Country, in which Travel their Cloaths were worn, their Bread mouldy, which they avowed to have been warm for newness when they first set out; their Barrels and Bottles of Wine broken, their Shoes patcht, and their Sacks rent and ragged: Yet Joshua having sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel, he durst not, though urged by the murmur of the People, to lay violent Hands on them; but he spared both their Lives, and the Cities of their Inheritance.

Josh. 9. 7.

Josh. 9. from the 5th to the 13th Verse.

Now if ever Man had warrant to break Faith, and to retract his Promise made, Joshua had it. For first; The Commandment which he received from God to root out this Nation among the rest, preceded by far the Peace which he had granted them. Secondly, He might justly have put these Men to the Sword, and have sackt their Cities; if there be any Evasion from a Promise made, whereof the Living God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites that he gave Peace, because he knew them to be a People hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the Hevites, it was not in his power to make a League with them. But it was to a strange People that he gave Faith, and to a Nation which came from far, who hearing of the Wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and over Jordan, sought for Peace and Protection from his People. Thirdly, The Accord which Israel made with these crafty Canaanits, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their Tale; that is, believed what they had said, and counselled not with the Mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these Men who were known Idolaters, and served those Puppets of the Heathen, Men of an Apish Religion, as all Worſhippers of Images are, could not challenge the witneſs of the true God, in whom they believed not. I ſay therefore, that if every Man might have ſerved himſelf by any Evaſion or Diſtinction, Joſhua might juſtly have done it. For he needed not in this caſe the help of Equivocation, or Mental Reſervation. For what he ſware, he ſware in good Faith; but he ſware nothing, nor made any Promiſe at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithleſs Subtility of Man ſhould borrow nothing in the future from his Example, who knowing well, that the Promiſes he made in the name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying Man, he held them firm and inviolable, notwithſtanding that they to whom he had ſworn it, were Worſhippers of the Devil.

Josh. 9. 7.

Josh. 9. 14.

For it is not as faithleſs Men take it, that he which ſwareth to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a King, and ſwareth by the Name of the living Lord, and in his Preſence, That this Promiſe (if it be broken) is broken to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a Prince; but the Promiſe in the Name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect; we therein profeſs that we fear him not, and that we ſet him at naught and defie him. If he that without Reſervation of Honour giveth a Lie in the preſence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour give the Lie to the King himſelf, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he break Faith with God, that giveth Faith in the preſence of God, promiſeth in his Name, and makes him a Witneſs of the Covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearful thing for a Son to break the Promiſe, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdom, to break thoſe Contracts which have been made in former times, and confirmed by publick Faith. For though it were 400 Years after Joſhua, that Saul, even out of Devotion, ſlaughtered ſome of thoſe People deſcended of the Gibeonites: yet God who forgat not what the Predeceſſors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Iſraelites had ſworn in his Name, afflicted the whole Nation with a conſuming Famine; and could not be appeaſed, till ſeven of Saul's Sons were delivered to the Gibeonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous Diſtinction, or by a God-mocking Equivocation, to ſware one thing by the Name of the living God, and to reſerve in ſilence a contrary Intent: The Life of Man, the Eſtates of Men, the Faith of Subjects to Kings, of Servants to their Maſters, of Vaſſals to their Lords, of Wives to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and all Trials of Right, will not only be made uncertain, but all the Chains whereby Freemen are tied in the World, be torn aſunder. It is by Oath (when Kings and Armies cannot paſs) that we enter into the Cities of our Enemies, and into their Armies. It is by Oath that Wars take end, which Weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to be, that makes an Oath thus powerful, but this: That he that ſweareth by the Name of God, doth aſſure others that his Words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true, whom he calleth for a Witneſs, and in whoſe Preſence he that taketh the Oath hath promiſed? I am not ignorant of their poor Evaſions, which play with the Severity of God's Commandments in this kind: But this indeed is the beſt Anſwer, That he breaks no Faith, that hath none to break. For whoſoever hath Faith and the Fear of God, dares not do it.

The Chriſtians in the Holy Land when they were at the greateſt, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them Tribute, did not only loſe it again, but were ſoon after beaten out of the Holy Land it ſelf: by reaſon (ſaith William of Tyre, a Reverend Biſhop which wrote that Story) that Almerick the fifth King after Godfrey brake Faith with the Caliph Elhadech, and his Vicegerent, the Soldan Samar; who being ſuddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turk Syracon to their Aid; whoſe Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Chriſtians out of the Holy Land; neither would the woodden Croſs (the very Croſs ſay they, that Chriſt died on) give them Victory over Seladine, when they brought it into the Field as their laſt Refuge; ſeeing they had forſworn themſelves in his Name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the Holy Ghoſt, That he that ſpeaketh Lies, ſhall be deſtroyed, and that the Mouth which uttereth them, ſlayeth the Soul: How much more perilous is it (if any Peril be greater than to deſtroy the Soul) to ſwear a Lie? It was Eugenius the Pope that perſwaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungary after his great Victory over Amurah the Turk, and when the ſaid King had compelled him to Peace, the moſt advantagious that ever was made for the Chriſtians, to break his Faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the War. And though the ſaid King was far ſtronger in the Field than ever; yet he loſt the Battel with 30000 Chriſtians, and his own Life. But I will ſtay my hand: For this firſt Volumn will not hold the repetition of God's Judgments upon Faith-breakers; be it againſt Infidels, Turks, or Chriſtians of divers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of Oaths now-a-days, is rather made a matter of Cuſtom than of Conſcience. Pſal. 5.6. Wiſd. 1.11.

It is alſo very remarkable; That it pleaſed God to leave ſo many Cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Iſrael, to ſcourge and afflict them, by fore-ſeeing their Idolatry, and as it is ſaid in the Scripture, To be Thorns in their Eyes to prove them, and to teach them to make War. For theſe Cities hereafter named, did not only remain in the Canaanites poſſeſſion all the time of Joſhua; but ſoon after his Death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plain Countries, and enforc'd to inhabit the Mountains, and places of hardeſt Acceſs. And thoſe of Judah were not able to be Maſters of their own Vallies; becauſe, as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And thoſe principal Cities which ſtood on the Sea-ſide, adjoyning unto Juda, were ſtill held by the remainder of Anakims, or Philiſtims; as Azzah, Gath, Aſdod, out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembred in Samuel. Joſh. 23. Judg. 1. 2. Judg. 3. 2. Judg. 1. 34. Jud. 1. 19. Joſ. 11. 19. 1 Sam. 17. 4.

Neither did the Children of Manaſſeh over Jordan expel the Geſhurites, nor the Maachathites; which inhabited the North parts of Baſan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nephthalims poſſeſs themſelves of Bethſhemiſh, nor of Bethanah; but they inforc'd thoſe Canaanites to pay them Tribute. Neither did Aſher expel the Zidonians, nor thoſe of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achzib, Heblah, Aphike, and Rehob, nor inforce them to a Tribute. Joſ. 13. 13. Jud. 1. 31.

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kitron, and Nahalol, but received Tribute from them. Alſo the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims; and among the Children of Manaſſeh, on the Weſt of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethſhean, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, and Meggido; yea, Hieruſalem it ſelf Joſ. 16. 10. Jud. 1. 27.

self did the Jebusites defend above four hundred Years, even till David's time.

Now Joshua lived one hundred and ten Years, eighteen of which he governed Israel, and then changed this Life for a better. The time of his Rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth divers to conjecture diversly of the Continuance. Josephus gives him five and twenty Years; Seder Ollam Rabbi, the Author of the Hebrew Chronology, eight and twenty; and Massius six and twenty; Maimonius, cited by Massius, fourteen; Joannes Lucidus, seventeen; Cusanus ten; Eusebius giveth him seven and twenty; and so doth St. Augustine; Melanthon two and thirty; Codoman five and twenty. But whereas there passed 480 Years from the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, unto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that we allow to Joshua only eighteen of them, as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to me seems the most likely, and as I think, a well approved Opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480 Years from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the Temple, convinceth of Error such as have inserted Years between Joshua and Othoniel, of whom Eusebius finds eight Years, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which he giveth his reason in his four and twentieth and last Chapters upon Joshua: Bunting reckons it nine Years, Bucholzer and Reusner but one, Codoman twenty, and Nicephorus no less than three and thirty; whereas following the sure direction of these 480 Years, there can be no void Years found between Joshua and Othoniel, unless they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed unto Joshua by the Account already specified. The Praises and Acts of Joshua are briefly written in the six and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where, among many other things, it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the Battels of the Lord?

Euseb. Prep Evang.

That he wrote the Book called by this name, it was the Opinion of Arius Montanus, because it it said in the last Chapter vers. 26. And Joshua wrote these words in the Book of the Law of God; which seemeth rather to have been meant by the Covenant which Joshua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serve and obey the Lord; which Promise Joshua caused to be written in the Book of the Law; and of this Opinion were Cajetan and Abulensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceive that the Book of Joshua was collected out of an ancient Volumn, intituled Liber Justorum; remembred by Joshua himself; Josh. 1. 13. and others, that it was the work of Samuel; for whereas Montanus groundeth his Opinion upon these words of the 26th Verse, And Joshua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to prove it; for when the People had answered Joshua, The Lord our God will we serve, and his Voice will we obey; it followeth that Joshua made a Covenant with the People, and wrote the same in the Book of the Law of God. 5. last ver. 24. v. 26.

There lived at once with Joshua, Erichthonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke Beasts together, thereby to till the Ground with more ease and speed: And about the same time the fifty Daughters of Danaus (as it is said) slew the fifty Sons of Egyptus, all but Lynceus who succeeded Danaus, if the Tale be true. There lived also with Joshua, Phœnix and Cadmus, and near the end of Joshua's Life, Jupiter is said to have ravished Europa the Daughter of Phœnix, (afterwards married to Asterius King of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But St. Augustine reports this Ravishment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was Father to Deucalion, and Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old Man at the War of Troy, and Sarpedan was in Person a young or strong Man at the same Trojan War. And so doth Nestor reckon up in the Counsel of the Greeks, Theseus and Perithous for Men of Antiquity, and of Ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israel, that were planted in the Borders of Phœnicia, with sundry Stories depending upon those places.

§. I.

The Proem to the Description of the whole Land of Canaan, with an Exposition of the Name of Syria.

THE Story of the Judges ought to follow that of Joshua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Jews was governed by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, shall be remembred when we come to the Description of Samaria: But because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Story past, with that which followeth hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better understanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions; that all things therein performed by the places known, may the better be understood and conceived. To which purpose (besides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I have bestowed on every Tribe his proper Portion; and do shew what Cities and places of strength were by the Jews obtained; and what numbers it pleased God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when ungrateful for his many Graces; they at sundry times forgat or neglected the Lord of all Power; and adored those deaf and dead Idols of the Heathen. Divina Bonitas (saith S. Augustine) ideo maximè irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro; & misericorditer temporalem adhibet severitatem, ne æternam justè inferat ultionem: The Divine Goodness is especially therefore angry angry in this World, that it may not be angry in the World to come; and doth mercifully use Temporal Severity, that it may not justly bring upon us eternal Vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I have added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of divers Kingdoms and Common-wealths; and to help my self herein, I have perused divers of the best Authors upon this Subject; among whom, because I find so great disagreement in many particulars, I have rather in such cases adventured to follow mine own Reason, than to borrow any one of their old Patterns.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistims, and the Land of Og and Sihon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Provinces of Syria; it shall be necessary, first to divide and bound the general, and so descend to this particular, now called the Holy Land.

Ptol. Asiæ. tab. 4. Syria, now Soria, according to the largest Description, as it was anciently taken, imbraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea to the Red Sea; and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. Ptol. 5. But taking it shorter, and from the Coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, unto Idumæa towards the South, Tigris towards the Sun-rising, and the Mediterranean Sea Westward: it then containeth, besides Babylonia, Chaldæa, Arabia the Desart, and Arabia Petræa, that Region also which the Greeks calls Mesopotamia; the Hebrews Syria, of the two Rivers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aram-Naharaijm is expounded; also Padan Aram; that is, Jugum Syriæ, because the two Rivers go along in it as it were in a Yoke.

Trogallus. Edessa, sometimes Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria, taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Cœlosyria, which the Latines call Syria Cava, because it lay in that fruitful Valley between the Mountains of Lybanus and Anti-lybanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were seated. Then Damascena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the City Damascus, and the Mountains of Lybanus, the Regal Seat of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adjoyning to it was the Province of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal; over which Adadezer commanded in Soloman's time. 1 King. 11. Then Phœnicia and the People of Syraphœnices: and lastly, Syria Palestina bordering Egypt; of which Ptolomy maketh Judea also a part; and to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syria Judæa. Herod. in Polym. Dion. l. 27. Ptol. Asiæ. tab. 4.

§. II.

Of the Bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the Promises touching this Land.

BUT that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and stretcheth from behind Lybanus to the great Deserts between Idumæa and Egypt; bounded by the Midland Sea on the West, and the Mountains of Hermon, Galaad and Arnon towards the East, the same Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Traconitæ, and Ptolomy Hippus. Strab. l. 10. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the Son of Cham, & Lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The Language was also called Canaan, saith Mornæus, and after Hebræa of the Hebrews, who took name from Heber, the Son of Sale, according to St. Augustine. Caleb. f. 62. But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noah's Sons, which past over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith he, is as much as transiens, or transmittens, of going or passing over. And because the Children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding; therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebrei, as it were passengers, which is also the Opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. Euseb. Præp. Evangel. 7. c. 3. It had also the name of Judea from Juda; and then afterwards intituled the Holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was born, and buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four, namely, into Edom, (otherwise Seir, or Edumea) Galilee, Samaria, and Judea. Galilee is double, the Superior, called Gentium, and the Inferior; and that Galilee and Judea are distinguished, it is plain in the Evangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia. Mat. 2. Luke 2. John 4.

Now besides these Provinces of Phœnicia, and Palestina (both which the River of Jordan boundeth; saving that Phœnicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also to the East of Jordan, and within the Mountains of Hermon, Gilead, and Arnon, otherwise Traconi, fell to the possession of half Manasseh, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also; as well because anciently possest by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites; which Eastmost parts are again divided into Basan, or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Machati, Gessuri, Argobe, Hus. They are known to the later Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in general, and by the names of Traconitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will speak in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Provinces, which fell to Manasseh, Gad, and Reuben, for these be his words. Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar until Azzah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Country North and South; then it followeth in the Text. And as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorah, and Admah, and Seboim, even unto Lasha; by which words Moses setteth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean. But in Deuteronomy it seemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written: All the places whereon the sole of your Feet shall tread shall be yours: your Coast shall be from the Wilderness, and from Lebanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Country North and South, this Description agreeth with the former; only Lebanon is put for Zidon: and the Wilderness for Gerar and Azzah, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates; then the Land promised stretcheth it self both over Arabia Petræa, and the Desart, as far as the border of Babylon, which the Israelites never possest, nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceive that by the River Perah, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates; taking light from this place of Josua: Behold I have divided unto you by lot these Nations, that remain to be an Inheritance according to your Tribes; from Jordan with all the Nations that I have destroyed, even unto the great Sea Westward. Deut. 11. 24. C. 23. v. 4.

And tho it be true, that David greatly enlarged the Territory of the Holy Land, even as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be Vadian. Epitom. trium terræ partium. cap. Palestina.

be taken for Euphrates: then was it but per genus in amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter so far to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries give advantage to those that would make any irreligious Cavil, as touching the Promise of God to the Israelites unperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his Worship and service, it pleased him, not only to inclose them within that Territory, which was for so many People exceeding narrow; but therein, and elsewhere, to subject them unto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods themselves also served and obeyed. And sure, the Promise by which the Hebrews claimed the Inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting injoying thereof, to wit, as long as the Heavens were above the Earth, was tied to those Conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other, than all Mankind could or can expect; who know, that all sorts of Comforts, from the merciful Goodness of God looked for, as well in this Life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we persevere in his Love, Service, and Obedience. So, in the 8th Verse of the 11th of Deuteronomy, the keeping of God's Commandments, was a Condition joined to the Prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall ye keep all the Commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the Land, whither ye go to possess it. Also that you may prolong your days in the Land which the Lord sware unto your Fathers, &c.

Deut. 11.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the Heavens are above the Earth. For if ye keep diligently, saith he, all these Commandments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possess great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, tho it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of God's Commandments, and their falling away from the Worship of his All-powerful Majesty, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditional Promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon Obedience unperformed: Yet I cannot mislike that Exposition of Melanthon; For, saith he, ostendit promissionem præcipuam non esse de hoc Politico Regno; He sheweth that his chief Promise is not of a Civil Kingdom. To which agrees that Answer, which S. Hierom made to a certain Heretick, in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierom, that he overthrew the Reputation of the Jews Story, and brought the Truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegory, and ad illam dumtaxat spiritualem terram quæ in Cœlis est, (that is) Only to that Land of the Living which is in Heaven. Quoniam tota Judæorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160 milliarium, latitudinem verò 40, & in his etiam regionibus loca verbes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam à Judæis occupata, sed tantum divinæ pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Country of the Jews is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160 miles in length, and 40 miles in breadth; and in these are Countries, Places, Cities, and many Towns, which the Jews never possest, but were only granted by Divine Promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh upon Esay, touching the Blessings promised unto Hierusalem; where he hath these words; De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palæstina Regione petendam; quæ totius Provinciæ deterrima est, & saxosis Montibus asperatur; & penuriam patitur sitis: ita ut cœlestibus utatur pluviis, & raritatem Fontium Cisternarum extructione soletur: sed in Deimanibus ad quam dicitur festinaverunt structores tui; From whence, saith he, we learn, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that Region of Palæstina, which is the worst of the whole Province, and ragged with craggy Mountains: and suffereth the penury of Thirst: so as it preserveth rain Water, and supplieth the scarcity of Wells, by building Cisterns: but this Hierusalem is in God's hands; to which it is said, Thy Builders have hastned: so far S. Hierom. Cap. 49. 14.

Where also, to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himself; Neque hoc dico in suggillationem terræ Judææ, ut Hereticus Sycophanta mentitur: aut quo auferam historiæ veritatem: quæ fundamentum est intelligentiæ spiritualis, sed ut decutiam supercilium Judæorum: qui Synagogæ angustias latitudini Ecclesiæ præferunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum vivificantem: ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem: Neither (saith he) say I this to disgrace the Land of Judea, (as the Heretical Sycophant doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the History, which is the Foundation of Spiritual Understanding, but to beat down the pride of the Jews; which enlarge the Straits of the Synagogue, farther than the breadth of the Church: for if they follow only the killing Letter, and not the quickning Spirit, let them shew the Land of Promise, flowing with Milk and Hony.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoever it be unlikely (seeing the West bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literal sense) that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East bound, should be taken only in a spiritual sense; yet nevertheless that Hierom's Opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be understood for Euphrates: and that the Promise it self was never so large, much less the Plantation and Conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asher, Nephtalim, and Zabulon, held the Northermost part, and were seated in Phœnicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe, yet before I speak, I must admonish the Reader touching the Names of Places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many Names, by reason of the divers Fancies of Translators, are diversly expressed; so that to the unskilful they may seem divers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversity (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly, because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want Vowels, the old Translators imagined other Vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly, because the Ancient expressed or omitted divers Consonants, otherwise than the latter think fit.

The Tribe of Asher.

¶. I.

The Bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

THE Asherites descended of Asher, the Son of Jacob by Zelpha, the Hand-maid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Ægypt, to the number of 41500, and odd Persons, all Men above twenty Years of Age, and able to bear Arms at the time, when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: All which number perishing in the Desarts, there remained of their Issues, besides Women and Children, 53400 Bodies fit for the Wars: which past the River of Arnon, into the Plains of Moab; and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their Portion that part of Phœnicia, from Zidon, and the Fields of Libanus, unto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Sea-coast, containing thirty English miles, or thereabouts; and from the Midland Sea to the East Border, some twelve miles; though Antonius makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in Wine, Oil, and Wheat, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable Commodities; according to that Prophesy, Asser pinguis panis; concerning Asser, his Bread shall be fat; And he shall give pleasures for a King.

¶. II.

Of Zidon.

THe first City seated on the North border of the Territory of Asser, was Zidon, which Joshua calleth the Great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greeks, and Q. Curtius, make Agenor the Founder thereof: and Justin derives the Name from the abundance of Fish found on those Shores; whereof it hath been called Zidona. But that it was far more ancient, Moses, Joshua, and Josephus witness, the same being founded by Zidon, the eldest of Canaan's Sons: and so strong it was in Joshua's Time, as neither did himself attempt it, neither could the Asserites, or any of their Successors, master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Christ, a City interchangeably governed, by their own Princes, or other Magistrates: though, according to the Warnings and Threats of the Prophets Esay, Jeremy, Ezekiel, and Zachary; it was often afflicted, both by the Enemies Sword, and by the Pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran, or Midland Sea. It hath to the North, the City of Berythus, and the River Leontis; and to the South, Sarepta, or Sarphat, which standeth between it and Tyre; the distance between which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is fourteen thousand paces, saith Seiglerus: but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Weissinbury, in his Description of the Holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twenty miles. This difference of distance, as well between these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to devise any new Scale to the Map and Description of the Holy Land.

Palæst. Seig. f. 19. Vadian. Pben. f. 278. Strab. l. 16.

What Kings it had till Agenor's Time, there is no memory. The Story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by Time consumed and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient than Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memory of Tyre; because it was but a Member of Zidon, and a City subject to the Kings thereof: though it be true, that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacy, and became far more renowned, opulent, and strong. From Zidon had Solomon and Zorobabel, their principal Workmen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of Learning, so did it in all other Mechanical Arts and Trades: the Prophet Zachary calling them, the Wise Zidonians. The City was, both by Nature and Art, exceeding strong, having a Castle or Citadel on the North side, standing upon an unaccessible Rock, and compassed by the Sea; which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle it hath on the South side, by the Port of Ægypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies besides that of Tyre, into places remote; as unto Thebes, and Sephyra, Cities of Bœotia in Greece.

Strabo and Pliny give the Zidonians the Invention of * Glass, which they used to make of those Sands which are taken out of the River Belus, falling into the Mediterranean Sea, near Ptolomais or Acon; and from whence the Venetians fetch the Matter of those clear Glasses which they make at Murana; of which S. Hierom and Pliny. Zidon insignis artifex vitri: Zidon vitrariis officinis Nobilis; Zidon a famous Glass-maker, or a skilful worker in Glass-houses.

* It seems that even in Joshua's time they practised Glass-making; whence Junius for Mistrephthmaim, which ad verbum, is as much as combustiones aquarum, reads fornaces vitrariæ. Jos. 11. 8. as it seems, because these Furnaces were where there was store of Water, either for the moving the Bellows by the force of the Water, or for other necessitry uses. But there are others that take them for Salt-pits, and others again for Hot-baths.

They were in Religion Idolaters, (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astaroth: Which Idols, tho common to the other of the Issue of Canaan, (as Pineda gathers out of 1 Sam. 31. 10. and Judges 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly, were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians; as appears 1 Kings 11. 5. in the story of Solomon's Idolatry, where Asteroth is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1 Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chief worshipper of Baal, where it is said, that he marrying Jezebel, the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Divers Baals, and divers Astaroths, in their Idolatries, they acknowledged; as it appears by the plural Names of Baalim and Astaroth, 1 Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for even the Name Astaroth, as I am informed by a skilful Hebrician, is plural; the singular being Astoreth: whence Jud. 2. 13. the Septuagint read ἐλάτρευσαν ταῖς ἀστάρταις; They worshipped the Astarties. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals, and Astoreths, may be diversly understood; either in respect of the diversity of the Forms of the Images, or of the Worship in divers places, or of the Stories depending upon them; which (as Fables use to be) were doubtless in divers Cities divers. Augustine Quæst. 16. in Judg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Juno by some such name as Astarte,

The form of Astaroth (or Astarte) seemeth to have been a Sheep; for, Deut. 7. 13. the word, in the plural number, signifieth Sheep; and this may confirm Augustin's Opinion, that Astarte was Juno: for the form of her Husband Jupiter Hammon was a Ram. Καλείται γαλὸν Ἄδωνιν.

Astarte, Tully, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making divers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte; whom he makes to be born of Tyrus and Syria, and to have been the Wife of Adonis. As also Macrob. 2. Saturn. cap. 21. says, that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians. And Hierom, upon Ezek. 8. 44. notes, that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous Women are noted to bewail) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seem, that in the Worship of Astarte, or Venus, they did bewail her Husband Adonis. As also the Grecians did in their Songs of Adonis, Mourner Adonis the Fair; Dead is Adonis the Fair. Howbeit, others in that place of Ezekiel, not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the Sacrifices of Isis: whose loss of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Ægyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus's loss of Adonis. And to this agreeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris, with the Ægyptians, is called Ammuz: which word may seem to be the same with Ezekiel's Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the Milk of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine and Gospel of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jews: who had been taught by Moses, and the Prophets, so many Years, whereof our Saviour, in Matthew and Luke; Wo be to thee Chorazin, &c. For if the great Works which were done in thee, had been done in Tyrus, and Zidon, they had repented long agone, &c. But I say unto you, it shall be easier for Tyrus, and Zidon, at the Day of Judgment, than for you.

Matth. 11. v. 20.

It received a Christian Bishop with the first; who was afterward of the Diocess of Tyre. But in the Year of our Redemption, 636, it fell into the hands of the Saracens; and continued in their Possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem, in the Year 1111, by the help of the Danes and Norways, who came with a Fleet to visit the Holy Land, and took Port at Joppa; it was again recovered, the Commandment thereof being given to Eustace Gremer, a Noble-Man of that Country. And again, in the Year 1250, it was reedified and strengthned by Lodowick the French King; while he spent four Years in the War of the Holy Land. Lastly, In the Year 1289, it was reconquered by the Saracens; and is now in possession of the Turks, and hath the name of Zai.

Of Sarepta, with a brief History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the River called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent Wine growing near it: Of which Sidonius;

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna,
Quæq; Sareptano palmite missa bibas.

I have no Wine of Gaza, nor Falerna Wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Serepta's Vine.

This City had also a Bishop of the Diocess of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turks, as the rest, and is now called Saphet, saith Postellus.

Not far from Sarepta, was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose Fleets of Ships commanded, and gave the Law over all the Mediterranean Sea, and the Borders thereof; during which time of Greatness and Power, the Tyrians erected Utica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa; of which Virgil; Urbs antiqua fuit Tyrii tenuere Coloni Carthago. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colony of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Cales. In Italy, Nola. In Asia the Less, Dromos Achillis, which City the Scholiast of Apollonius placeth near the River Phyllis, in Bithynia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor; and so it is written in Joshua 19. taking its name from the scituation, because built on a high Rock, sharp at one end. The Latins, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra; for Virgil calleth the Purple of Tyre, Ostrum Syrranum, by which name Juvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high Hill, whereof many ruins remain to this day, the place being still known by the name of the Ancient Tyre: And because it was a Colony of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon: which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus, by affinity of name, makes Thiras the Son of Japhet, to be the Parent thereof: and though, no doubt, it was very ancient, (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious City, whose antiquity is of ancient days?) yet, that Thiras the Son of Japhet, set himself in the Bosom of the Canaanites, who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I see nothing to perswade me.

But that new Tyre, in after-times, so renowned, seemeth to be the Work of Agenor: and of this Opinion was Curtius, and Josephus. And Eusebius makes this City elder than Solomon's Temple 240 Years: Cedrenus 361, who also addeth that Tyrus the Wife of Agenor, gave it her name: but of Agenor, I will speak more at large in the story of their Kings.

For Strength, and for the Commodity of the Harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island, 700 paces from the Continent; and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the midst of the Sea, as some read; or as others, in the innermost part of the Sea; whence he calleth it, situate at the entrance of the Sea; as also the same Prophet calleth it, the Mart of the People for many Isles: and Esay, a Mart of the Nations. And so Proud, Wealthy, and Magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen, the Nobles of the World.

Ezek. 28. 2. 27. v. 3. Esay 23. 3. —— 27. 8.

It excelled, both in Learning, & in Manufacture; especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet Cloth: Which, saith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dog, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura, the Hair of his Lips became of that colour. It worshipped the same Idols that Zidon did; saving that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crown of Gold, and other Gifts, desiring to remain his Friends and Allies, answered them, That he had vowed a Sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonians Kings, and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountain of old Tyre, where he might perform that Ceremony. But this availed not, for Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Town, which being denied, he, as one whom no peril Peril could fear, nor Labour weary, gather together as many Ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many weighty Stones from the old City of Tyre adjoyning, as notwithstanding that his Materials were often washt away with the strength of the Sea, and the Tides, yet he never rested, till he had made a foot passage from the Continent to the Island: and having once approached their Walls, he over-topt them with Turrets of Wood, and other Frames; from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving Spirit of Resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which, he caused 2000 more to be hung up in a rank all along the Sea-shore; which Execution upon cold Blood he perfotmed (as some Authors affirm) upon the issues of those Slaves which had formerly slain all their Masters, taking their Wives, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themselves. This Victory of Alexander over the Tyrians, Josephus remembreth; and how Sanballet revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000 Souldiers; who was the last Satrapa, or Provincial Governour, which Darius seated in Samaria; the same who having married his Daughter to Manasseh, Brother to Jaddus the High Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might be built on the Mountain Garizim, over Samaria; that the Forces of the Jews being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in Obedience. The Honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his Son-in-Law Manasseh, whom the Jews oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. Tyrius calleth Sanabula, died.

Joseph. ant. Judæ. l. 11. c. 8.

De bell. sacr. l. 13. c. 4.

Long before this desolation of Tyre, by the Cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King; when the growing Pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the Beauty, Riches, and Power of that City. He besieged it both on the Land side, and with threescore Ships of War held the Port; to the end that neither any Victuals nor any supply of Men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve Sail scattered that Fleet, and took 500 Prisoners of the Assyrians; notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his Resolution and lay before it by his Lieutenants five Years, but with ill success. And this Siege Menander Ephesius, cited by Josephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as he found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrians (which the said Menander converted into Greek) adding that Elulæus, whom Tyrius calleth Helisæus, was then King of Tyre, having governed the same six and twenty Years. Soon after this repulse of Salmanasser, and about 200 Years before the Victory of Alexander, Nebuchodonosor at such time as he destroyed Jerusalem with the Temple, came before this City; who indeed gave to Alexander the Example of that despairful work of joyning it to the Continent. For Nebuchodonosor had formerly done it; though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same Causey and Passage was again broken down, and demolished.

Josep. Ant. l. 9. c. 14. Et tom. Ap. 1 Guil. Tyrius, de bell. sacr. 13. 4. Josep. Ant. l. 9. c. 15.

Against Nebuchodonosor for many Years, the Tyrians defended themselves; for so long did these Babylonians continue before it, As every Head was made bald, and every Shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Isaiah had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end, and after thirteen Years siege or more, the Tyrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembring over-late the predictions and threatnings of God's Prophets, having prepared a convenient number of Ship, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained; and with their Wives, Children, and portable Riches, sailed thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritimate Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates; so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfy so many Labours and Perils, or any Person upon whom to avenge themselves for the loss of so many bodies in that War. It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this Resolution, as in a work of his own) to make Nebuchodonosor victorious over the Egyptians; and gave him that Kingdom and the Spoil thereof, as it were in Wages for his Army. Whereupon St. Hierome noteth, that God leaveth not the good Deeds of the Heathen unrewarded; who tho they cannot hope by any laudable worldly Action, to attain unto that eternal Happiness reserved for his Servants and Saints; yet such is the boundless Goodness of God, as he often repayeth them with many Worldy Gifts and Temporal Blessings.

Ezek. 29. 18. Isa. 23, &c.

Ezek. 29. 19.

Now of this Enterprise of Nebuchodonosor against Tyre, prophane Historians have not been silent. For both Diocles and Philostratus (as Josephus citeth them) the one in his second Book, the other in his Phœnician Histories remember it.

Josep. Ant. l. 10. c. 13.

After these two great Vastations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon, this City of Tyre repaired and recovered it self again; and continued in great glory about 300 Years, even to the coming of our Saviour Christ; and after him flourished in the Christian Faith near 600 years; the Arch-bishop whereof gave place to none but to the Patriarch of Hierusalem only; who within his own Dioceſs had fourteen great Cities with their Bishops and Suffragans; namely Caipha, otherwise Porphiria, Acon or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Cæsarea Philippi, Berytus, Biblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthosia, Archis, Aradus, Antarudus (or Tortosa) and Maraclea. But in the Year 636, it was with the rest of that beautiful Region of Phœnicia and Palestina, subjected to the cruel and faithless Saracen. Under the burden and yoke of whose Tyranny it suffered with other Palestine Cities 488 years.

Gul. Tyr. bell. sacr.

In the year 1112, it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierusalem, but in vain: yet in the year 1124, by Guaremonde, Patriarke of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their Fleet of Gallies, it was again recovered, and subjected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165 years.

Gul. Tyr. 11. bel sacr. 17.

Finally, in the year 1189, Saladine having first taken Hierusalem, removed his whole Army and sat down before Tyre, drawing his fleet of Ships and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then only remaining in the Christian Power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great Famine, and many other Miseries, they at once with certain rafters of Timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens Fleet, and sallying out resolvedly upon his Army, slew so great numbers of them, and followed their Victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two Years after which Victory the body of that famous Frederick Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians Enemies over a River unfordable, perished rished by the weight of his Armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral Church of Tyre, near unto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garnished and graven with guilt Pillars of Marble, 940 years before therein buried; but in the year 1289, the Saracens again attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subject to the Turks.

¶. IV.

Of Ptolomais, or Acon.

THe third City along the Coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtain, on the South Bound of Asser was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof, after Hierom; though other good Authors affirm, that it took name from Acon the Brother of Ptolomy. Pliny calleth it Ace; and otherwise the Colony of Claudius. It had also the Name of Coth, or Cod; and by Zeiglerus it is called Hactipos.

Plin. lib. 5. c. 19. in descrip. terr. sanct.

But, lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais, after the name of one of the Ægyptian Ptolomies; which City also, as it is 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infideliously wrested from his Son-in-Law Alexander, which called himself the Son of Antiochus Epiphanes; the same Alexander having married Cleopatra, Daughter of the said Ptolomy, not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Maccabæus treacherously surprized and slain, as it is 1 Maccab. 12. 48. by the perfidiousness of Tryphon; whom soon after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing; and by like reason, about the same time, was the aforesaid Alexander in the War against Demetrius, one of the Sons of Antiochus the Great, with whom Ptolomy joined, overthrown and treacherously murthered by Zabdiel the Arabian, to whom he fled for succour; and his Head presented unto his Father-in-Law Ptolomy, who enjoyed not the Glory of his Victory and Treason above three days, for God struck him by Death.

1 Mac. 1. 10.

1 Mac. 11. 18.

For the Beauty and Strength of this City, this Alexander made it his Regal Seat; two parts of the same being invironed by the Sea; and the Port for Safety and Capacity, not inferior to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Hierusalem some 34 miles: four miles to the North, from the Mountain Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antoninus maketh it 32 Italian miles. In the midst of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Belzebub, and therefore called the Castle of Flies; on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetual Light, like unto that called Pharus in Ægypt; to give comfort in the Night to those Ships, which came near and sought that part. It had in it a Bishop's Seat, of the Diocess of Tyre, after it became Christian; but in the Year 636, (a fatal Year to the Christians in those Parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracen. In the Year 1104, it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the help of the Gallies of Genoa; to whom a third of the Revenue was given in recompence. Again, in the Year of our Lord God, 1187. Saladine, King of Ægypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the Year of Christ 1191, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, In the Year 1291, it was, by the fury of the Saracens, besieged with an Army of 150000, entred, sackt, and utterly demolished; tho in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of St. George.

FIve miles from Ptolomais, towards the East, is the Castle of St. George seated, in which he was born; the Valley adjoyning bearing the same name. And though, for the credit of St. George's killing the Dragon, I leave every Man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the Kings of England had not some probable Record of that his memorable act, among many others, It was strange that the Order, full of Honour, which Edward the Third founded, and which his Successors royally have continued, should have born his Name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those days, as that the English were driven to make such an Erection upon a Fable, or Person fained. The place is described by Adrichomius, in his Description of Asser, to have been in the Fields of Libanus, between the River Adonis and Zidon: His own words are these; Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longè à Beryto, memorant inclitum Christi Militem D. Georgium, Regis filiam ab immanissimo Dracone asseruâsse: eamq; mactata bestia parenti restituisse. In cujus rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit ædificata. In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, Men say that the famous Knight of Christ, St. George, did rescue the King's Daughter from a huge Dragon: and having killed the Beast, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which Deed, a Church was after built there: Thus far Adrichomius. His Authors he citeth Ludovicus Roman. Patric. Navigationum, l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley under this Castle some time called Asser, was afterward called the Valley of St. George. If this Authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorical, figuring the Victory of Christ, than accept of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

BEtween Ptolomais and Tyre, alongst the Sea-coast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which St. Hierom calleth Achziph, and Josephus Ecdippos, Pliny Ecdippa, one of those which defended it self against the Asserites. Belforrest finds Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelve Searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, travelled as far to the North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe off Asser, which Rechob, as also Berotha, which by Ezekiel, cap. 47. v. 16. is placed in these North Borders, belonged, in David's time, to the King Hedarhezer, as it may be gathered out of 2 Sam. 8. 8. and 10. 6. and it defended it self against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek, did.

This Aphek it was, whose Wall falling down, slew 27000 of Benhadad's Souldiers, after that 100000 had been slaughtered by the Israelites, under the conduct of Ahab. Here Junius finds that the Philistims incamped, a little before the Battel, at Gilboa, tho in his Note upon 1 Sam. 9. 1. he takes Apheck there mentioned (at which Battel the Ark was taken) to have been in Judea. Of which Josh. 15. and 53. and in 2 Kings 13. 17. he he reads, Fortiter, for, in Aphek. Where others convert it, Percutiens Syros in Apheck.

1 Kings 20. 29. 1 Sam. 29. 1.

The next place along the Coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a Point of Land which extended it self into the Sea, between Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the First rebuilt and fortified, in the year of Christ 1157, when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this Castle, ariseth that most plentiful Spring of Water, which Solomon remembreth, called the Well of Living Waters: from whence, not only all the Fields and Plains about Tyre, are made fruitful by large Pipes hence drawn; but the same Spring, which hath not above a bow-shot of ground to travel till it recover the Sea, driveth six great Mills in that short Passage, saith Brochard.

Itin. 1.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hosa: and beyond it, under the Mountains of Tyre, the City of Achsaph, or Axab, or after St. Hierom, Aciſap, a City of great strength, whose King, amongst the rest, was slain by Joshua, at the Waters of Merom.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other Places.

FArther into the Land, towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the Eastermost Hills of Tyre, in the year 1107, thereby to restrain the Excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians; the place adjoining being very fruitful, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle, the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their Names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappel, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, in which Humphrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the Third, King of Hierusalem, lieth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Asser; whereof four are seated almost of equal distance from each other; to wit, Castrum Lamperti, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium, and Belfort. The first near the Sea, under the Hills of Saron; the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and Fellowship of the Teutonici, or Dutch Knights, (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians, at such time as the Saracens possest the best part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which Order was in Ptolomais Acon. The first Fortress was, for Beauty and Strength, called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the River Naar, near the City Rama: of which in this Tribe, Josh. 19. 29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma, making the Article a part of the word, and mistaking the Vowels; from the siege of this Castle of Belfort, the great Saladine, King of Syria and Ægypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great loss and dishonour repulsed.

Herold. l. 2. c. 4. Continuationis Bell. sac.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which S. Hierom calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Asser, as Roob (or Rechob) not far thence did.

Towards the South from Roob, they place Gabala, (which Herod, surnamed the Ascalonite, rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabol, Quod Syrorum lingua dispicere significat (saith Weisshenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre, was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Solomon presented unto him in recompence of those Provisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others think this Chabol, or Cabul, containing a Circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to have been without the compass of the Holy Land; tho bordering Asher on the North side: as it is said, 1 Reg. 9. 11. that they were in Regione limitis; that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Country: for it was not lawful, say they, to give to Strangers any part of the Possession allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appears 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seems they were conquered by David, from the Syri Rechobæi, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

2 Sam. 10. 6.

Almost of equal distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Giscala was made famous by John the Son of Levi, who from a mean Estate, gathering together 400 Thieves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee; at such time as the Romans attempted the Conquest of Judea; by whose practice Josephus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himself hath written at large, in his second Book of those Wars. This John betraying, in all he could, the City of Giscala (whereof he was Native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gave opportunity, during the Contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it; who at the same time forc'd it, and burnt it to the ground: But being by Josephus's Authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They find also the Cities of Cana Major, and * Cades (or Cedessa); of the first was that Syro-Phœnician, whose Daughter Christ delivered of the Evil Spirit. Near the other, they say, it was that Jonathas Maccabæus overthrew the Army of Demetrius.

There are, besides these forenamed Cities within the Tribe of Asser, divers others; as on the South Border, and near the Sea, Messal, or Misheal: within the Land * Besara, † Bethdagon, and Bethemec, standing on the South Border, between Asher and Zabulon: on the North side, joining to Syro-phœnicia, is the City of Hethalon, or Chethlon, the utmost of the Holy Land that way: under which, towards the Sea, is Chali, and then ‖ Enoch, supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his Son Enoch, but without probability, as I have formerly proved. There are others also besides these, as Ammon, or Chammon, of which Josh. 19. 28. where also we read of Nebiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beton: the Cities of Alcath, or Chelcath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which we have already mentioned, were by the Asserites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made Judg. 1. 30. to which, out of Joshua, we may add Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no story dependeth, and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

¶. VIII.

Of the Rivers and Mountains of Asser.

THe Rivers to the North of Asser, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Ziegler joyneth Lycus, Ptolomy, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea near Berytus: which River of Leontis, Montanus draws near unto Zidon: finding his Head notwithstanding, where Ptolomy doth, between Zidon and Tyre.

Asiæ.Tab.4. Tyre. It hath also a River called Fons horrorum Libani, which Adrichomius, out of Brocard, intituleth Eleutherus: for which he also citeth Pliny; and the first of Machabees the 11. Chap. but neither of those authorities prove Eleutherus to be in Asser: Asiæ.Tab.4. for this River falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Aradus, not far from Balanea, witness Ptolomy: and Post Orthosiam & Eleutherum est Tripolis. therefore Ponetus calleth it Valania, and Postellus, Velana: which River boundeth Phœnicia on the North side; to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principal River of Asser, Arias Montanus calleth Gabatus, Christianus Schrot, out of the Mouth and Papers of Peter Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our Age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the main River, Fons horrorum Libani: and one of the Streams which runneth into it from the North side, Nasr; and another from the South-west, Chabul: of the City adjoining of the same name; for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another River described by Adrichomius, named Jephthael, which I find in no other Author, and for which he citeth the nineteenth of Joshua, but the word Ghe which is added there to Jephthael, is not taken for a River, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Vulgar, the Geneva, and Arias Montanus turn it. There is also found in Asser, the River of Belus, remembred by Josephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith † Pliny: out of the Sands of this River are made the best Glass, which sometime the Zidonians practised; and how the Venetians at Muriana. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a Branch of Chedumim; which it cannot be; for Belus is known to flow from out the Lake Cendevia; as all Cosmographers, both Ancient and Modern, and the later Travellers into those parts witness. It is true, that the River of Chison, taketh Water from Chedumim; but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomais Acon, according to Montanus, but farther to the South, between Caiphas and Sicaminum, witness Ziegler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

* The word Nachal is ambiguous, either for a Valley, or for a River: but this word Ghe, is always a Valley, as in Gehinnon and Gethsemaim.

Josephi. l.2. Bell. Ind. c.3.

† L. 5. c. 19. in Josua 19.26 it is called Shichor; of which name many understand another Stream, Josh. 13.3, which running by Petra of Arabia, falleth into the Lake Sirbonis, and divideth Ægypt from the promised Land; whereabout they place Rhinocolura, for which City Junius taketh Shichor in that place of Joshua; but howsoever, whether this Shichor, Josh. 13. 3. be a River or a City, it appears that this Name is found, both in the North bound of the Holy Land, Josh. 19. 26. and in the South bound, Josh. 13. 3.

Besides these Rivers, there are divers famous Springs and Fountains, as that of living Waters adjoining to Tyre: and * Maserephot, or after S. Hierom, Maserephotmaim, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adjoining, (they say) the Inhabitans, by seething the Water, make Salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

* See the Marginal Note above, in the second Section of this Paragraph.

The Mountains which bound Asser on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Cœlosyria; two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phœnicia, and Syria, extend themselves far into the Land Eastward, four hundred stadia, or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giveth to the Valley of Cœlosyria; which those Mountains inclose: but Pliny gives them 1500 furlongs in length from the West (where they begin at Theipsophon, or Dei facies, near Tripolis) to the Mountains of Arabia beyond Damascus; where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These Ledges, where they begin to part Traconitis and Basan, from the Desart Arabin, are called Hermon: which Moses also nameth Sion; the Phœnicians, Syrion; and the Amorites, Sanir; neither is this any one Mountain apart, but a continuation of Hills; which running farther Southerly, is in the Scripture called Galaad, or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Jeremy proveth; Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of all those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knows them by the Name of Traconite; and Ptolomy by Hippus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountains bordering, Asser, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giveth no reason for his Opinion.

Strab.l.10. Pto. Asiæ. Tab.4.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops; because, according to Tacitus, the highest of them are covered with Snow all the Summer; the Hebrew word Libanon (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whiteness. Others call them by that name of the Frankincense which those Trees yield; because λίβανος is also the Greek word for that Gum.

Sueton.

Niger out of Aphrodiseus affirmeth, that on Libanus, there falleth a kind of Hony-dew, which is by the Sun congealed into hard Sugar, which the Inhabitants call Succhar, from whence came the Latin word Saccarum.

Nig.p.503.

The Rivers which Libanus bestoweth on the Neighbour Regions, are, Chrysorrhoas, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons horrorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountains of Asser, are those Hills above Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitful; but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountain of Abarim, in Ruben, Moses beheld Libanus threescore miles distant.

§. IV.

The Tribe of NEPHTALIM.

¶. I.

Of the Bounds of Naphtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THE next proportion of the Land of Canaan, bordering Asher, was the upper Galilee; the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Naphtalim, the Son of Jacob by Bilha, the Handmaid of Rachel: who while they abode in Ægypt, were increased to the number of 53400 Persons, able to bear Arms, numbred at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their Bodies in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their Sons 45400, besides Infants, Women, and Children, under twenty years of Age. The Land of Naphtalim took beginning on the North part from the Fountains of Jordan, and the Hills of Libanus adjoining, as far South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Asher, and on the East & South-east by Jordan.

On the North side of Libanus, and adjoining to this Territory of Naphtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabite; in which Tract, and under Libanus, was the City of Heliopolis; which the heigth of the Mountains adjoining shadowed from the Sun, the better part of the day. Postellus calls it Balbec: Niger, Marbech; and Leonclavius, Beallebeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Ægypt: the first called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldean Paraphraft, otherwise Bethsemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis, The City of the Sun: into which, saith Ulpian, Ulpian, Severus the Roman Emperor sent a Colony: the other Gasselius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a City in Thrace, and Glyca in Phrygia.

There is also, in the same Valley adjoining to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidaca, over which Herod, Agrippa, and Berenice the Queen commanded.

Abilon also gave name to the Region adjoining; of which Lysanius, the Son of Herod the Elder, became Tetrarch or Governour; whereof Ptolomy gave it the addition of Lysanii, and called it Abila Lysanii. Volaterran names it Aphila, of which he notes that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was Native, who by Volaterran is intituled Aphilius, not Abilenus. After that this City of Abila, or Aphila, had received the Christian Faith, Priscillinus became Bishop thereof; slain afterward by our British Maximus at Trever. For distinction of this City (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembred, that in the Tribe of * Manasseh, joining upon the Bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another City of the same name, saving that it is written with an (E) for an (I), and called Abela, remembred in the 20*th* Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Josephus calls Abelmachta, and Hierom, Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel, for distinction-sake, it is written, Abel Beth-Mahaca, (for belike it was the Town of Mahaca, the Wife of Machir, the Son of Manasseh, the Father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This City Joab besieged; because Seba the Son of Bichri, who rebelled against David, fled thereinto for succour; but a certain wise Woman of the City perswading the People to cast Seba his Head over the Wall, Joab retired his Army. The same City was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benhadad; and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

* Also a third in Ephraim called Abel Mechola; and a 4th in Reuben, called Abel-Sittim, also Abel-Misraim, at the Ford of Jordan, and (as it seems) in the same Tribe of Reuben; of all which, in that which follows, to which also we may add, Abel-Magnum, the name, as some think, of a City, otherwise called Bethshemes, near the border of the Philistims; or according to others, of the great Stone in the Border. 1 Sam. 6. 18. Joseph. Ant. l. 7. *c.*10. 2 Sam. 20. 1 Kings 15. 2 Kings 15.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signify Bewailing, or a plain Ground, and therefore no marvel, that many Towns (with some addition for distinction-sake) were thus called; for even of bewailing many places took Name, as Bochim, Judg. 2. 4. and so doubtless * Abel-Misraim, *Gen.*50. 11. and yet Junius, in his Note upon Numb. 33. 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plain ground there, (to wit, in the Land of Moab) and so perhaps Abel-Mehola in the Tribe of Ephraim; the Town of Elisha the Prophet; also Abel-Vineraum of the Ammonites, whither Jeptha pursued them.

* And Abel Magnum. 1 Sam. 6. 18. *Judg.*7.24 1 Reg. 19. 15. Judg. 11. 35.

¶. II.

Of Hazar.

* Of two other Cities of this name in Judea, see chap. 9. §. 1. of a fourth in Benjamin, See that which follows in this place. Of a fifth in this Tribe of Naphtalim, called Kin-Chatsor, we read Josh. 19. 37. to which we may add Chatsor-Hinan, in the uttermost North-east of Manasseh, over Jordan, Ezek.47. *Numb.*34. 8. Also in Simeon, Chatsar-Susima, of which 1 *Chron.*4.31. which also is called Chatsar-Susa, and Chatsar-Gadda: and lastly, Chatsar-Sualh, another City of Simeon. Fol. 19. 3.

IN this Tribe of Nephtalim, was that famous City of Jabin, in Joshua's time, called Asor, (or after the Chaldean Paraphrast, Hatsor) by Josephus, Asora; by Junius, * Chatzor; which Laish names Hesron, the Regal City and Metropolis of Canaan, seated in the West part of Naphtalim, towards Asher. In this City was that great Rendevouz, and assembly of those four and twenty Kings against Joshua; who being all overthrown, slain, and scattered, this their powerful City was by Joshua taken and burnt to Dust. But in process of time, the same being rebuilt by the Canaanites, a second King Jabin, 137 years after the death of this first Jabin, invaded the Israelites: and being ordained of God to punish their Idolatry, he prevailed against them, and held them in a miserable servitude twenty years; till Deborah the Prophetess overthrew Sisera, Jabin's Lieutenant, and his Army, near the Mountain Tabor. This City Solomon restored at such a time as he also reedified Gezar, burnt by Pharaoh of Ægypt, with * Megido, Bethoron, and other Cities; but about 260 years after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalasar, King of the Assyrians. It is now, saith Adrichomius, called Antiopia; it was one of the principal Cities of Decapolis. There is another City of this name in the Territory of Benjamin, seated on the Confines of Ascalon, called the new Hazor, † saith Hierom.

Of Cæsaria Philippi.

THere was also on the Border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned City of Lais, or Lajisch, as Junius writes it, or Leschen; which City the Children of Dan (being straightned in their Territory under Juda) invaded and mastered, and gave it the name of their own Parent Dan; and by that name it is written in Gen. 14. at which place Abraham surprised Chedorlaomer and his Confederates; and followed his Victory as far as Sobah, formerly remembred in the Division of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the joint name of Leschem Dan. Weissenburgh writes it Lacis; the Geneva, Laish; Josephus, Dana; Benjamin, Balina; Breitenbach, Belena; but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witness Neubrigensis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the Monk, and Postellus; who also taketh this City to be the same which in Mat. 15. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan: for which the Greek Text hath Magdala in that place; and in S. Mark, speaking of the same story, Dalmanutha. At such time as the Children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free City, of the Alliance and Confederacy of the Zidonians, or else subject unto the Kings thereof; for it is written, Judges 18. And there was none to help, because Lais was far from Zidon: and they had no business with other Men; for it was above 30 English miles from the Mediterranean Sea, and from Zidon.

*Judg.*18. *Chap.*8.10. *Vers.*28.

In after-times, when these Regions became subject to the State of Rome, it had the name of Paneas, from a Fountain adjoining so called; and therefore Ptolomy calls it Cæsaria Pania. Hegesippus calls it Parnium, saith Weissenburgh: But he had read it in a corrupt Copy, for in Hegesippus, set out by Badius, it is written Paneum, without an (R): and at such time as Philip the Son of the Elder Herod, Brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Governour of Traconitis, sometime Basan, this City was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his own name, and to flatter Tiberius Cæsar, he called it * Cæsaria Philippi; and so it became the Metropolis, and head head City of Trachonitis; and one of the first Cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa, in the succeeding Age, greatly adorned; by him, in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as nothing remained with that Emperor, but the memory of his impiety; so in S. Jerom's time the Citizens remembred their former Paneas, and so recalled it, with the Territory adjoining by the ancient name. Of this City was that Woman whom Christ healed of a bloody Issue, by touching the Hem of his Garment with a constant Faith; who afterward, as she was a Woman of great Wealth and Ability, being mindful of God's Goodness, and no less grateful for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper; the one representing Christ, as near as it could be moulded; the other made like her self, kneeling at his Feet, and holding up her Hands towards him. These she mounted upon two great Bases, or Pedestals, of the same Metal, which she placed by a Fountain near her own House; both which (saith Eusebius) remained in their first perfection, even to his own time, which himself had seen, who lived in the Reign of Constantine the Great. But in the year after Christ, 363, that Monster Julian Apostata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast down and defaced, setting up the like of his own in the same place; which Image of his was with Fire from Heaven broken into fitters; the Head, Body, and other parts, sundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time living. The truth of this Accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his 5th Book and 20th Chapter.

Euseb. Eccl. l. 7. c. 14. Niceph. l. 6. c. 15.

This City built by the Danites, was near the joining together of those two Rivers which arise from the Springs of Jor and Dan, the two * apparent Fountains of Jordan; in a Soil exceeding fruitful and pleasant; for as it is written, Judg. 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the World. In the Fields belonging to this City, it was that S. Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Son of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this City received the Christian Faith, it was honoured with a Bishops Seat: and it ran the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians; under Fulco the fourth King of Jerusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bulloin, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians: and shortly after by them again it was recovered. Lastly, Now it remaineth, with all that part of the World, subjected to the Turk.

* Josephus in the Book of the Jewish War, 18 saith, That Philip the Tetrach cast Chaff into a Fountain called Phiala, distant 120 stadia North-east from Cæsaria; which Chaff being carried under ground, was cast up again at Panium, or Dan, whereby it is conjectured, that the first Spring of Jordan, is from this Fountain called Phiala, from whence Jor and Dan receive their Waters.

¶. IV. Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capernaum is not the least; so often remembred by the Evangelists. This City had the honour of Christ's presence three years; who for that time was as a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the Doctrine of our Salvation; according to that notable Prophesy of Esay 9. The people that walked in darkness, have seen a great Light: they that dwelt in the Land of the shadow of Death, upon them hath the Light shined.

Capernaum was seated on Jordan, even where it entreth into the Sea of Galilee, in an excellent and rich Soil: of whose destruction Christ himself prophesied in these words. And thou Capernaum, which art lifted up unto Heaven, shalt be brought down to Hell, &c. Which shewed the pride and greatness of that City; for it was one of the principal Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And tho there were some marks of this City's magnificence in St. Jerom's time, as himself confesseth, it being then a reasonable Burgh, or Town; yet those that have since, and long since seen it, as Brochard, Bridenbech, and Saliniac, affirm, that it then consisted but of six poor Fishermens Houses.

The Region of ten principal Cities, called Decapolitana, or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned; and in S. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, also remembred; but I find no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had; and so Pliny himself confesseth: for Marius Niger speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the Mountain Casius in Cassiotis, and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia; by which description it imbraceth Phœnicia, a part of Cœlosyria, all Palestina, and Judea.

Mat. 4. Mark 7. Luke 8. Niger. comment. Asiæ. 4. f. 503.

Pliny also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, he numbreth four of them to be situated towards Arabia; to wit, first these three, Damascus, Opotos, Raphana; then Philadelphia (which was first called Ariana, saith Stephanus, or as I guess, Amana rather, because it was the chief City of the Ammonites, known by the name of Rabbah, before Ptol. Philadelphus gave it this later and new name). Then Scythopolis, sometime Nysa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memory of his Nurse, who died therein, anciently known by the name of Bethsan: for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Cœlosyria, which was also called Antioch and Selencia); but it is Gadara in Basan, which Pliny in this place meaneth, seated on a high Hill, near the River Hieromax. This River Ortelius takes to be the River Jaboc, which boundeth Gad and Manasseh over Jordan: but he mistaketh it, for Hieromax falleth into the Sea of Galilee, between Hippos and Gerasa, whereas Jaboc entreth the same Sea between Ephron and Phanuel. For the seventh, he nameth * Hippos or Hippion, a City so called of a Colony of Horsemen there garisoned by Herod, on the East side of the Galilæan Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of Manasseh over Jordan. For the eighth, Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the South Border of the Region over Jordan, called Peræa. For the ninth, Gelesa, which Josephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Cœlosyria by Josephus, Hegesippus and Stephanus; but by Ptolomy (whom I rather follow) in Phœnicia. The tenth, and last, Pliny nameth Canatha; and so doth Suetonius, and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala; but Hegesippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Basan over Jordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, have the shape of a Camel. But the collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region took name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Saligniac, which make them to be these; Cæsaria Philippi, and Asor, before remembred, Cedes Nephtalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capernaum, Bethsaida, Jotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Bethsan. For all other Authors disagree herein, and give no reason for their Opinion. One place of the Evangelist St. Matthew makes it manifest, that this Region, called Decapolitana, was all that Tract between Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written; And he departed again from the Coasts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came unto the Sea of Galilee, through the midst of the Coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North, by the Phœnician Sea, between Zidon and Ptolomais on the West; by the Hills of Gelbo and Bethsan on the South; and by the Mountains Traconei,

¶. V. Of Hamathu

But to look back again towards Libanus, there is seated, near the foot thereof, the City of * Hammath, or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Country adjoining taketh name: the same which Josephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: † Jacobus Zeigler, Ituræa. Ituræa Regio tenet borealia tribus Nephtali, per montem Libanum usq; Trachones. The Country of Ituræa, saith he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephtali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis, Ituræa, he mistakes the Seat of this Region; and so doth Mercator. For indeed were Ituræa (which Hegesippus calls Peræa, and G. Tyrius, Baccar) the same with Traconitis, yet Traconitis it self is far more to the East than Hammath in Naphtalim; for Traconitis lieth between Cæsaria Philippi, and the Mountains Trachones, which the Hebrews call Galead: and this Hammath, or Chammath, is seated under Cæsarea, towards the Sea Westward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew, by confounding Emath, or Hamath the Great in Cælosyria, beyond the Mountains Trachones, which ‖ Jerom upon Amos calls Antiochia, with Hammath, or Hamath the lesser in Phœnicia; and Naphtalim, which he calleth Epiphania: for this Hammath, or in our Translation Hamath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is set far from the North border of Canaan in Syria Soba,) is remembred in Numb. 34. 8. and Numb. 13. 22. and in Ezek. 47. 16. In the first of which places, it bordereth the Land of Promise: the same being the words; From Mount Hor you shall point (that is, direct or draw a line) until it come to Hamath. In the second place, thus; So they went up and searched out the Land from the Wilderness of Sin, unto Rehob to go to Hamath. Then in Ezekiel; The West part also shall be the great Sea from the Border till a man come over against Hamath; that is, the Coast of the Sea shall be the West Border from the Southermost part of the Holy Land, till you come directly over against Hamath Northward: from whence, if a Line be drawn to the Sea, it will touch the Wall of Zidon; which is * the North-west Corner of the Holy Land.

* The Septuagint write it Ammoth, Jerom, Emath. Josephus, Amath. Josh. 19. 35. Chammath. Ch. 21. 32. Chammoth-Dor. 1 Chron. 6. 76. Chammon. 2 King. 14. 8. Chamath-Jehuda, as Junius reads it. Whereas also, for further distinction, there is added (in Israel) to note that it was of old belonging to Judah, tho seated in Israel, that is in the Kingdom of the ten Tribes; the other Chamath being in Syria Soba.

† Zeigler. in Naptal.

‖ So Jerom in his Comment in Amos 6. 2. where there is mention of Hamath the Great, as it seems, for distinction from the other in Naphtalim; tho Mat. Beroaldus rejecting Jerom, rather follows the Opinion of Zeigler above-mentioned, as indeed it cannot easily be justified, that either one or other of these is either Antiochia, or Epiphania: howbeit, that the same City which, Josh. 19. 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Naphtalim, was also called Chamath, (whence the word Hamath and Emath were framed) it may be gathered, partly because the other Hamath, 2 Chron. 8. 3. for distinction is called Chamath-Tsoba, as this (as it may seem by Josh. 21. 32.) was Chamath-Dor, and Chamath-Judæ, as we have noted 2 Reg. 24. Secondly, because Numb. 34. 8. and also Ezek. 47. 10. Chameth in the North side of the Holy Land, is placed too near the West corner to be that Chamath-Tsoba: for in the line which should make the North border, which begins at the great Sea, they make Moses to name never a place Eastward along all the breadth of the Holy Land, until we come to Hermon (for so they expound Mount Hor, Numb. 34. 7.) and beyond Hermon Eastward in this North side, they make him to name divers Towns, first Chamath, then Tsodad, then Ziphron; and lastly, Chatsar-henan: a thing most unlikely, seeing Israel had little or nothing Eastward beyond Hermon. Therefore we must needs expound Hor to be one of the Hills near Sidon; and so those Towns, as they are named to lie in order on the North side of Asher, Naphtalim, and Manasses: and in like manner those in Ezekiel; first, Chetlon, then Chamath; and so in order, Berotha, Sibraim, Tsedad, Chauran, Chatsar-Henan. * Of which, Jos. 19. 35.

Now that this Hamath, or Hammath, which Moses also made the Confine of the Holy Land, is that of Naphtalim, both the reference which it hath to the West Sea, and the City of * Rehob adjoining prove it: the other Hamath, or Emath (being far removed, and beyond the forenamed Mountains, which inclose all those Lands which Israel ever had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Ituræa, witness † Stella and Laicstan, and not that in Naphtalim, where ‖ Jonathas Maccabæus attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night.

* Which Rehob, or Rechob, is Josh. 19. 28. is placed in Asher towards Zidon, in the Confines of Naphtalim.

‖ Jos. Ant. 13. 8.

For tho Traconitis be comprehended within Ituræa (and therefore it is said to be finitima Galilæa Gentium) yet it hath beginning over the Mountains Traconis, and so it stretcheth into the Plains of the Territory of Ituræa; whence Philip the Brother of Herod was Tetrarch or President, both of Ituræa and Traconitis; both which are over Jordan towards the East. But Chamath in Naphtalim, is on the West side of Jordan towards the Mediterranean Sea.

The Country Ituræa was so called of Jethur, one of the Sons of Ishmael; it is placed in the Bounds of Celosyria and Arabia * the Desart.

* That it doth properly belong to Arabia, the name of Jethur Ishmael's Son, whose Issue settled in the Arabians, may in part give witness. Also the place of 1 Chron. 5. 19. confirms it, where Jethur is named among the Hagarens, against whom the Reubenites and Gadites made war, and whose Country they took in the time of Jeroboham, as their Forefathers had done in the time of Saul, after his Conquest of the Amalekites. 1 Chron. 5. 10. where the Country is placed in the East of Gilead.

The People of Ituræi, were valiant and warlike Men, and excellent Archers. Of whom Virgil; Ituræi Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Yew the Ituræans Bows were made.

This City Chamath, or Hamath, in Naphtalim, seems to have been as ancient as the other in Ituræa, both built by Amathus, the 11th Son of Canaan. Whether in the time of David, this, or the other had Toha for King, it is not certain; for Hamath, or Emath, beyond the Mountains, and Hammath in Naptalim were both Neighbours to Damascus; of whose subjugation Toha rejoiced, because Hadadeser, whom the Damascens came to help, was his Enemy. This Toha fearing the strength and prosperity of David, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his Peace with many rich Presents, and with many ancient Vessels of Gold, Silver, and Brass.

But it seemeth that David in such great success, would not have had Peace with Toha, if he had been King of any place in Naphtalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tysoba; which City Solomon, after his Father's Death, made himself Master of, as a part of the Lands (* in the larger and conditional Promise) allotted by God to the Children of Israel.

* Of the larger Promise expriss Deut. 1. 7. where Euphrates is named for one of the Bounds, so Cap. 7. 24. Jerom. de Locis Hebr.

But this Hammath of Naphtalim, in the end, and after divers Mutations and Changes, both of Name and Fortune, being, as it hath been said, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While S. Jerom lived, it remained a City well peopled, known to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greeks by Epiphania.

¶. VI. Of Reblatha and Rama, and divers other Towns.

IN the Border of Hamath, or Emath, towards Jordan, standeth the City Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the Fountain Daphnis, which falleth into the Lake of Meron. Hereunto was Zedekias brought Prisoner, after his surprize in the Fields of Jericho, and delivered to Nebuchodonosor: who to be avenged of Zedekia's Infidelity, beyond the proportion of Piety, first caused the Princes his Children to be slain in his presence: and to the end that this miserable Spectacle might be the last that ever he should behold in this World, and so the most remembred, he commanded both his eyes presently presently to be thrust out: and binding him in Iron Chains, he was led a Slave to Babylon, in which estate he ended his Life. Of which seldom-exampled Calamity, tho not in expres words, Jeremiah the Prophet foretold him in Jerusalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly, speaking in the Person of God, I will bring him to Babel, to the Land of the Chaldeans, yet shall he not see it, tho he shall die therein.

Jer. 32. 34. &c. Ezek. 52.

There are besides these before-remembred, many other strong Cities in Nephtalim; as that which is called * Cedes: there are two others of the same name, one in † Isachar, another in Juda, of which Josh. 15. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is known by the addition of ‖ Nephtalim, as Judg. 4. It is seated on a high Hill, whence Josh. 20. 7. Kedesh in Galilæa in monte Nephtali: Josephus calls it Cedesis: and in S. Jerom's time it was called Cidissus. Belforest greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Desar of Pharan.

* Or Kedesh, Josh. 19.37. & 20.7. & 21.32. item Judg. 4.6. † 1 Chron. 6.72. which Jos. 19.20. is called Keshion. ‖ Sometime Kedesh in Galilee, 1 Chron. 6. 76. Jos. 12.22. 2 Reg. 15. 29.

After the King thereof, among other of the Canaanites, perished by the hand of Joshua, it was made a City of Refuge, and given to the Levites. Herein was Barack born, who overthrew the Army of the second Jabin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime possest by Teglatphalassar, when he wasted all Nephtalim: afterward by the Romans, and numbred for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolitan Region: when it had imbraced the Christian Faith, it was honoured with a Bishop's Seat; but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turks, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes, some four Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephet, which was also one of the ten Decapolitan Cities; a place exceeding strong, and for many years the inexpugnable Fortress of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both Inland and Maritimate near it. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, seated Northward near Sephet: this is to be noted, that there are * divers places of this name in Palestine, all situate on Hills; and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebræis excelsum, Rama with the Hebrews is high). Also that for this Rama, Josh. 19. 36. they read Arama, making the Article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of divers Towns) to be a part of the word: whence casting away the Aspiration, they read Arama. From Sephet towards the West, they place † Bethsemes, of which Josh. 19. 38. which defended it self against Nephtalim, Jud. 1. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet, towards the East, was Bethanath, who also kept their City from the Nephtalims.

* Set in Benjamin, and in Ephraim. † Other Cities there were of this name (which is as much as domus Solis) as that in Juda, 2 King. 14. 15. where Joash King of the Ten Tribes, overcame Amasia of Juda, of which also I understand the place, Josh. 21. 16. & 1 Sam. 6. 14. & 2 Chron. 29. 18. A third, as it seems, was in Dan. 1. King. 4. 9. which, Josh. 19. 41. is written Hirshemes, which is as much as cinatis Solis. Jud. 1. 31.

Adjoining to which standeth Carthan * or Kiriathasim, a City of the Levites, not far from the Mountain, out of which the Springs of Capernaum arise, called Mons Christi; a place by our Saviour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choice of twelve, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers; of which place, or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the † Evangelists.

* So it appears, by comparing of the places, Josh. 21. 32. & 1 Chron. 6. 76. Adrichomius both here & elsewhere deceived by the double name, makes two of one: altho I deny not but that there was another Kiria-thajim in Reuben; of which Josh. 13. 19. † Mark 3. Mat. 10. Acts 1. Mat. 5. 6. 7.

* Josh. 19. 38.

Adjoining to these are Magdalel, a place of strength; * and Masaloth, of which we read, that it was forced by Bacchides, in the time of the Maccabes *: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berothaes of Naphtalim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe; † one near Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. Another (upon a weak conjecture out of Joseph. Ant. J. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth, in this Tract, near the Waters of Merom; because the Kings that joined with Jabin against Joshua, which incamped at the Waters of Merom, Josh. 11. 5. are by Josephus said to have incamped at the City Berotha in Galilee, not far from Cedesa Superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Berotha of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the Upper Galilee, or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim near Abela, (of which Abela, or Abel-beth-mahacah, we have spoken already) this he doth upon a conjecture touching the place, 2 Sam. 20. 14. where some read Abel & Bethmahacah, & omnia loca Berim; but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berai; for Sheba being of Benjamin (in which Tribe also there is a City called Berotha, or Beeroth) drew the Men of that City after him.

* 1 Mac. 9. 2. † Barathæna Ptolomæo in fine Arabiæ deserta: Junio eadem cum Berothai una civitatum Hadadezers. 2 Sam. 8. 8. Jos. 18. 25. Asroth Hierom. Jud. 4. Lyr. in Jud. 4. Jos. 19. 37. 1 Reg. 15. 20. 2 Reg. 15. 29.

To the North of Berotha of Naphtalim, standeth Sebarim under Libanus, remembred by Ezek. 47. and Aroseth gentium, near the Waters of Merom, or Samachonitis, the City of Sisara, Lieutenant of the Army of the second Jabin: from whence, not far off, towards the Sea of Galilee, is Edrai, or Edrehi, a strong City; besides many others, whereof I find no particular Story of importance; as Ser in Josh. 19. 35. called Triddim-Tzer, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Assedim and Ser: then Adama, which they call Edama; also Hion, which they call Ahion; of which in the Books of Kings. Then the strong City of Cinnereth, after called Gennezareth, whence we read of the Land and Lake of Gennezareth; the same Lake which is also called the Sea of Tiberias. In the body of the Land they place Galgala to the South border; of which ‖ Macc. 19. 2. also divers others named, Josh. 19. as Ucuca, or Chukkok: Horem and Azanoth-tabor (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Joshua: Jirzon, Lakkum Jepnael, Heleb, and * Reccath; which two last they place near Cæsaria Philippi: To these they add out of Joshua, Nekeb, and Adami; for which two Junius readeth Fossa Adamæi, making it no Town, but a Ditch cast by some of Adamath, as it seems; or at least the custody of which March or Limit belonging to the Town. To these out of Numb. 34. 10. they add Sephana, which 1 Sam. 30. 21. seems to be called Sipmoth. As for Tichon and Helon, whereof the former they fetch out of Ezek. 47. 16. and the latter out of Joshua 19. 33. it may appear by Junius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former, he readeth Mediani, and for the latter Quercetum. The City of † Naphtalim, which they make the native Place of Toby and Nasson near unto it, they fetch out of the vulgar Translation, Tob. 7. 7. but in the Greek Text there is no sign, neither of the one nor of the other.

Mac. 6. 13. Luke 5. 1.

‖ This place of the Maccab. warrants no Galgala, or Gilgal in Naphtali; but may well be understood of Gilgal in Benjamin, or in Manasseh.

* This Reccath, or Rakkath, Junius thinks that it is the same with Karthan, (one of these being made of the other by transposition of Letters) of which Karthan we have noted already, that it is also called Kiria-thajim. † In the place which also they bring to prove that there was a City called Naphtalim, as it is evident by the following Verses, the Tribe of Naphtalim is meant, and not any City of that name.

§. V.

The Tribe of Zabulon.

OF Zabulon, or Zebulon, another of the Sons of Jacob by Lea, there were muſtered at Mount Sinai 57400 able Men, beſides Women, Children, and aged unable Perſons; all which dying in the Deſarts, there entred the Holy Land of their Iſſues 65000 fit to bear Arms; who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Aſher to the River Chiſen; Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran, Eaſt and Weſt:

* Joſh.12. 22. † Joſep.2. bel.19. ‖ Joſph.2. bel.22.

The Cities within this Tribe, which border Aſher, are Sicaminum on the Sea-ſhore, of which *Joſeph Ant.*13. c. 19. Debbaſet of * which *Joſh.*19.11. Jeconam, or Jokneham, (whoſe King was † ſlain by Joſhua, and the City was given to the Levites) and Gaba, after called the City of Horſemen, of a Regiment there garriſoned by Herod. Then the City which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the City of Men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, ‖ burnt to the ground by Ceſtius, Lieutenant of the Roman Army. Adrichomius makes it the birth City of Elon* Judg of Iſrael, becauſe he is called Zabulonita; not marking that in the ſame place he is ſaid to be buried at Ajalon.

To the Eaſt of this City of Zabulon is Cateth, of which *Joſh.*19.15. on the border of Aſher; and beyond it the leſſer † Cana of Galilee, where Chriſt converted Water into Wine; the native City of Nathaniel, and, as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountains of Zabulon; and then the City of Cethron (in Ziegler, Ghiltron) which defended it ſelf againſt Zabulon. Then Berſabe which ſtandeth in the partition of the upper and neather Galilee, fortified by Joſephus againſt the Romans. Not far from hence ſtandeth Shimron of Meron, whoſe King was ſlain by Joſhua.

Then Damna, or Dimna, a City of the Levites; then Noa, or rather Neha, of which Joſh. 19. 13. Then Dothan, or Dothain, where Joſeph found his Brethren feeding their Flocks; the ſame wherein Eliſæus, beſieged by the Syrians, ſtrook them all blind.

Beyond it, towards the Eaſt, they imagine ‖ Amthar, or Amathar; then Remmon of the Levites. The laſt of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon, is Bethſaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, ſituate on the Galilæan Sea, and watered by the Springs of Capernaum, the native City of the Apoſtles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Chriſt did many Miracles; but theſe People being no leſs incredulous than the Capernaims, and others, received the ſame curſe of threatned Miſeries; as, Wo be unto thee Bethſaida, &c.

Alongſt the Weſt border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethſaida, was the ſtrong Caſtle of Magdalum, the Habitation of Mary Magdalen, not long ſince ſtanding.

* The names of the chief Cities ſeated about this Sea, or Lake, thro which Jordan runeth, were Capernaum, Tiberias, Bethſaida, Gadara, Tarichea; & they add Cinereth, which in former times gave name to the Lake & Country. Mat.9. Luke 5. Joſ.Ant. 18.3.

And beyond it the ſtrong & high ſeated City of Jotapata, fortified by Joſephus in the Roman War: but in the end, after a long Siege, ſurprized by Veſpaſian; who ſlaughtered many thouſands of the Citizens; and held 1200 Priſoners, whereof Joſephus the Hiſtorian was one.

The laſt and greateſt of the Cities on that *Sea, and the Lake of Genezareth within Zabulon, was that of Tiberias; from whence afterward the Galilæan Sea alſo changed name, and was called the Sea of the City Tiberias, ſo named in honour of Tiberius Cæſar; it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolitan, and the greateſt and laſt of the lower Galilee. From hence our Savious called Matthew, from the Toll or Cuſtom-houſe, to be an Apoſtle, and near unto it raiſed the Daughter of Jairus from death; it was built (as Joſephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the Brother of Philip, in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius Cæſar; in the moſt fruitful part of Galilee, but in a ground full of Sepulchres; Quum juxta noſtras leges (ſaith he) ad ſeptem dies impurus habeatur, qui in talibus locis habitet; Whereas by our Law he ſhould be ſeven days held as unclean who inhabited in ſuch a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Joſephus it appears, that this Tiberias is not (as ſome have thought) the ſame as the old Cinnereth, which was ſeated, not in Zabulon, but in Naphtalim.

Joſeph 10.15. Adrich. in Zab.

Near unto this Tiberias at Amaus, there were hot Baths, where Veſpaſian the Emperor encamped againſt Tiberias: More into the Land, toward the South-weſt, is Bethulia, ſeated on a very high Hill, and of great ſtrength, famous by the ſtory of Holofernes and Judith, ſuch as it is. Near which ſtandeth Bethleem of Zabulon; and adjoining unto it, Capharath fortified by Joſephus againſt the Romans; and Japha an exceeding ſtrong place, afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in fury, ſlew 15000 of the Citizens, and carried away above 2000 Priſoners.

Joſep. in vita ſua. Joſep. 2. bell.25.

On the South ſide are the Cities of Cartha of the Levites, and Gabara, of which Joſephus in his own Life, then Jafic according to Adrichomius (of which *Joſ.*19.12.) for he thinks that it is not that Japha of which we ſpake but now out of Joſephus. Jideala, of which *Joſh.*19.15. Jerom calls it Jadela; under it weſtward Legio, (afterward a Biſhop's Seat) and the City Belma, in ancient Times exceeding ſtrong, remembred Judith 7.3. otherwiſe Chelma. Between Legio and Nazaret, is the City Saffa, or Saffra, the birth City of Zebedæus, Alphæus, James, and John: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Joſephus: Sepphorum, according to Brochard; which afterward, ſaith Hegeſippus and Jerom, was called Diocæſaria; the City of Joachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary, it was called by Herod the Tetrarch: and by him, as Joſephus ſpeaks, made the head and defence of Galilee; in another place he ſaith, Urbium Galilææarum maxima Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Veſpaſian e're he wan it. Herod Antipas, when he made it the Regal Seat of the nether Galilee, and ſurrounded it with a ſtrong Wall, called it Autocratorida, which is as much as to ſay, Imperial, ſaith Joſephus; and it is now but a Caſtle called Zaphet.

Joſephus otherwiſe Riſloth Thabor, as Junius thinks upon Joſ.19.12. whence 1 Chron. 6.77. it is called Thabor.

Johan. de Montevil. la.c.4. & 20.

Joſ.Ant. 18.3. in vita ſua.

To the South-weſt of this Sephoris, or Diocæſarea, was that bleſſed place of Nazareth, the City of Mary the Mother of Chriſt; in which he himſelf was conceived, it ſtandeth between Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this City he abode chiefly 24 years, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Chriſtians afterward were for many years. It was erected into an Archbiſhoprick in the following Age. Near unto it are the Cities Buria (afterward well defended againſt the Turks) and Nahalal, of which *Joſ.*19.15. and *Jud.*1.30. where it is called Nahalol: and *Joſ.*21.35. where it is a City of the Levites, near the Sea; adjoining to the River of Chiſan, is Sarid, noted in Joſhua for the uttermoſt of Zabulon.

In this Territory of Zabulon, there are divers ſmall Mountains; but Tabor is the moſt renowned, by the Apparition of Moſes and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Chriſt, in the preſence of Peter, James, and John; unto whom Moſes and Elias appeared; in memory whereof, on the top of the Mountain, the Empreſs Helen built a ſumptuous Chappel.

The chief River of Zabulon, is Chiſon; which riſing out of Tabor, runneth with one ſtream Eaſtward ward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another ſtream weſtward into the great Sea. This River of Chiſon, where it riſeth, and ſo far as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim, or Cadumim: and for mine own Opinion, I take it to be the ſame which Ptolomy calleth Chorſeus; tho others diſtinguiſh them, and ſet Chorſeus by Ceſaria Paleſtinæ. There is a ſecond Torrent, or Brook, that riſeth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a Branch of a River riſing out of the Fountains of Capernaum, which falleth alſo into the ſame Sea, and near Magdalum; which Torrent they call Dotham, from the Name of the City from which it paſſeth Eaſtward to Bethſaida, and ſo joining with Jordanis Parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Jephthael, which Joſhua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

§. VI.

The Tribe of Issachar.

THE next adjoining Territory to Zabulon, to the South and South-weſt, was Iſſachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increaſed in Egypt, as appeared by their Muſters at Mount Sinai 54400, able and warlike Men, who leaving their Bodies with the reſt in the Deſarts, there entred the Holy Land, 64300.

Taricheain Suicton. The firſt City of this Tribe, near the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, diſtant from Tiberias 8 Engliſh miles, or ſomewhat more, a City wherein the Jews (by the practiſe of a certain mutinous upſtart, John the Son of Levi) took Arms againſt Joſephus the Hiſtorian, then Governor of both Galilees. This City was firſt taken by Caſſius, and 3000 Jews carried thence captive; and afterward, with great difficulty by Veſpaſian, who entred it by the Sea ſide, having firſt beaten the Jews in a Sea-fight upon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the Sword all ſorts of People, and of all Ages; ſaving that his Fury being quenched with the Rivers of Blood running through every Street, he reſerved the remainder for Slaves and Bondmen. Next to Tarichea is placed Ceſſion, or Ciſhion, of the Levites, and then Iſachar, remembred in 1 Kings 4.17. then Abes, or Ebets, Joſh. 19.20. and Remeth, of which Joſh. 19. 21. otherwiſe Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 73. or Jarmuth, Joſh. 21. 29. this alſo was a City of the Levites, from whoſe Territory the Mountains of Gilboa take beginning; and range themſelves to the Mediterranean Sea, and towards the Weſt as far as the City of Jezrael; between which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethpheſes, or Bethpaſſes, according to Ziegler, and Enadda, or Hen-chadda: near which Saul ſlew himſelf: under thoſe Aphec, or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Iſachar; between which and Suna, he ſaith, that the Philiſtims incamped againſt Iſrael, and afterward againſt Saul, a Land thirſty of Blood; for herein alſo, ſaith he, the Syrians, with 32 Reguli, aſſiſting Benhadad, incountred Achab: and were overthrown and ſlaughtered: to whom the King of Iſrael made a moſt memorable Anſwer, when Benhadad vaunted before the Victory; which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his Harneſs boaſt himſelf, as he that putteth it off; meaning, that Glory followed after Victory, but ought not to precede it. In the year following, in the Fields, as they ſay, adjoining to this City, was the ſame vain-glorious Syrian utterly broken and diſcomforted by Achab, and 100000 Footmen of the Aramites, or Syrians, ſlain: before which overthrow, the Servants and Counſellors of Benhadad (in deriſion of the God of Iſrael) told him, That the Gods of Iſrael were Gods of the Mountains; and therefore if they fought with them in the Plains, they ſhould overcome them. 1 King. 20 23.

Joſ. 21.28. Kiſhion, which, 1 Chron. 6.72. is called Kediſh.

Joſh. 19. 1 Sam. 4.1. —29. 1. 1 King. 20. 26. In the latter two places, Junius makes Aphek in Aſſer, according to Joſ. 19.30. in the firſt he placeth it in Juda, out of Joſ. 15. 53. 1 King. 20.

Under Aphec, towards the Sea, they ſet the City of Eſdrelon, in the plains of Galilee, called alſo the Great Field of Eſdrelon, and Maggedo; in the border whereof are the Ruins of Aphec to be ſeen, ſaith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After theſe are the Cities of Caſaloth, of which 1 Macc. 9.2. Anem, or Hen-Gannim of the Levites; and Seeſima, or Shahatſima, the Weſt border of Iſachar, of which Joſh. 19.22. From hence ranging the Sea-coaſt, there is found the Caſtle of Pilgrims; a ſtrong Caſtle, invironed with the Sea, ſometime the Storehouſe and Magazine of the Chriſtians, and built by the Earl of S. Giles, or Tolouſe. Judith 1. 8. & 7.3. 1 Chron. 6.73. Joſ. 21.29.

From the Caſtle of Pilgrims, the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and at the farthermoſt ſhore beginneth Mount Carmel, not far from the River Chiſon; where Elijah aſſembled all the Prophets and Prieſts of Baal, and prayed King Achab, and the People aſſembled, to make trial, whether the God of Iſrael, or the Idol of Baal, were to be worſhipped, by laying a Sacrifice, without Fire, on the Altar: which done, the Prieſts of Baal prayed, and cut their own Fleſh after their manner, but the fire kindled not; while Elijah in deriſion told them, that their God was either in purſuit of his Enemies not at leaſure, or perchance aſleep, &c. But at the Prayer of Elijah, his Fire kindled, notwithſtanding that he had cauſed the People to caſt many Veſſels of Water thereon; by which Miracle the People incenſed, ſlew all thoſe Idolaters on the Banks of Chiſon adjoining.

At the foot of this Mountain, to the North, ſtandeth Caiphas, built, as they ſay, by Caiphas the High Prieſt. It is alſo known by the name of Porſina and Porphyria, ſometime a Suffragan Biſhop's Seat. Returning again from the Sea-coaſt, towards Tiberias, by the Banks of Chiſon, there are found the City of Hapharaim, or Aphraim, and the Caſtles of Meſra and Saba; of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chiſon, a beautiful City while it ſtood, in the Gates whereof Chriſt raiſed from Death the Widows only Son. Luke 7.

Then Seon, or Shion, named Joſh. 19. between the two Hills of Hermon, in Iſachar: beyond it ſtandeth Endor, famous by reaſon of the Enchauntreſs that undertook to raiſe up the Body of Samuel, at the inſtigation of Saul.

Beyond it ſtands Anaharath and Rabbith, named Joſh. 19.19,20. Then Dabarath, as it is named Joſh. 21.28. or Dobratha, as it is named 1 Chron. 6. 72. This City (which ſtretcheth it ſelf over Chiſon) was a City of Refuge belonging to the Levites.

Next to Daberath is Arbela ſituate, near the Caves of thoſe two Thieves which ſo greatly moleſted Galilee in Herod's Time. It joineth on one ſide to the Mountain of Iſachar or Hermon, and on the other to the Valley of Jezrael; which Valley continueth it ſelf from Bethſan, or Scythopolis, the Eaſt border of Iſachar, even to the Mediterranean Sea; two parts whereof are incloſed by the Mountains of Gilboe on the South, and by Hermon, and the River Chiſon on the North. In theſe * Plains Gideon overthrew the Madianites, and herein, they think, Saul fought againſt the Philiſtims: Achab agains the Syrians, and the Tartars againſt the Saracens.

§. VII.

The half of the Tribe of MANASSEH.

¶. 1. Of the Bounds of this half Tribe; and of Scythopolis, Salem, Therſa, and others.

THE next Tribe which joineth it ſelf to Iſachar towards the South, is the half of Manaſſeh, on the Weſt ſide of Jordan. Manaſſes was the firſt begotten of Joſeph, the 11*th* Son of Jacob. His Mother was an Egyptian, the Daughter of Putiphar, Prieſt and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manaſſes, with his Brother Ephraim, the Grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbred amongſt the Sons of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve Patriarks.

Of Manaſſeh, there were increaſed in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200 able Men: all which being conſumed in the Deſarts, there entred of their Iſſue 52700 bearing Arms. The Territory which fell to this one half of Manaſſeh, was bounded by Jordan on the Eaſt, and Dora upon the Mediterran Sea on the Weſt, Jezrael on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

Plin. lib. 5. c. 18. The firſt and principal City which ſtood in this Territory, was Bethſan, ſometime Nyſa, ſaith Pliny, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurſe there buried, of the ſame name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward, when the Scythians invaded Aſia the Leſs, and pierc'd into the South, to the uttermoſt of Cœloſyria, they built this City anew, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the City of Scythians given it by the Greeks.

Theſe barbarous Northern People, conſtrained the Jews to fight againſt their own Nation and Kindred, by whoſe hands when they had obtained victory, they themſelves ſet on the Jews which ſerved them, and ſlew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmoſt towards the South of Cœloſyria: and Strabo joins it to Galilee. It is ſeated between Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aulone ad montes acrabitena, ſaith Ziegler. But I find it in the Eaſt part of the Valley of Jezrael near Jordan: after that Jordan ſtraitneth it ſelf again into a River, leaving the Sea or Lake Genezareth. Notwithſtanding, Montanus deſcribes it far to the Weſt, and towards the Mediterranean Sea, near Endor, contrary to Stella, Laieſtan, Adrichome, and all other the beſt Authors. This City was the greateſt of all thoſe of Decapolis: but the Children of Manaſſeh could not expel the Inhabitants thereof, and therefore called it Sane, an Enemy; or Beth-ſan, the Houſe of an Enemy.

Judg. 1. Joſh. 17. de Bell. ſacr. Over the Walls of this Bethſan, the Philiſtims hung the Body of Saul, and his Sons, ſlain at Gilboe. It had, while the Chriſtian Religion flouriſhed in thoſe parts, an Arch-biſhop, who had nine other Biſhops of his Dioceſs numbred by Tyrius, in lib. 14. cap. 12. but the ſame was afterward tranſlated to Nazareth. The later Travellers in thoſe parts affirm, that there is daily taken out among the rubbiſh and the ruins of that City, goodly Pillars, and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witneſs the ſtately buildings and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poor and deſolate Village.

Jerom in Epiſt. ad Evagr. & in Loc. Hebr. From Bethſan, keeping the way by Jordan, they find an ancient City called Salim; which City, the ancient Rabbins, ſaith Jerom, do not find to be the ſame with Jeruſalem; there being, in the time of Jerom, and ſince, a Town of that name, near Scythopolis before remembred; which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13. 18. do not confirm, where the Vulgar readeth tranſivitq; in Salem urbem Sichemorum (for which others read, venit incolumis ad Civitatem Sechemum, making the word Shalem not to be a proper Name, but an Adjective) yet the place John 3. 13. where it is ſaid, that John was baptizing in Ænon near Saleim, may ſomewhat ſtrengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Saleim of which S. John ſpeaketh, is but contracted of Shahalim, of which in the Tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. 9. 4. This word Junius maketh to be the plural of Shuhal; of which we read, 1 Sam. 13. 17. for as for that which is added out of Cant. 6. 12. of Shulammitis, as if it had been as much as a Woman of this Saleim, near Ænon, it hath no probability.

Not far from thence, where they place Salem, they find Bezech the City of Adonibezec; Joſephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul aſſembled the ſtrength of Iſrael and Juda, to the number of 330000, when he meant to relieve Jabeſh-Gilead, againſt Naaſh the Ammonite; who would give them no other conditions of Peace, than to ſuffer their right Eyes to be thruſt out. Near Bezech, is the City of Bethbera, or rather Beth-bara, of which Judg. 7. 24. in the ſtory of Gedeon; and then Ephra, or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited; in the Border whereof ſtood an Altar conſecrated to Baal: which he pulled down and defaced; and near it that Stone on which Abimilec the Baſtard ſlew his 70 Brothers, (an heatheniſh Cruelty, practiſed by the Turks to this day); and not far hence, between the Village of Aſophon and Jordan, Ptolomæus Lathurus overthrew Alexander King of the Jews; and ſlaughtered, as Joſephus numbreth them, 3000; but according to Timagenes 5000: after which Victory, as Ptolomy paſt by the Villages of the Jews, he ſlew all their Women, and cauſed the young Children to be ſod in great Caldrons, that the reſt of the Jews might thereby think that the Egyptians were grown to be Men-eaters, and ſtrike them with the greater terror.

This City Bezek, by the place Jud. 1. 3. ſeemeth to have been in Juda. Joſ. Ant. l. 6. c. 5 1 Sam. 11.

Joſ. Ant. l. 13. c. 21.

Towards the Weſt, and on the border of Iſſachar, they place the Cities of * Ener of the Levites, and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, Jud. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim; it was the Habitation of Heliſeus the Prophet, numbred among thoſe places, 1 Reg. 4. 12. which were given in charge to Baana by Solomon; to whoſe charge alſo Tahanach belonged, a place of great ſtrength, which at the firſt reſiſted Joſhua, tho their King was afterward hanged, and their City given to the Levites.

* This Aner, Junius upon 1 Chron. 6. 70. makes to be the ſame with Tahanac, of which Joſ. 21. 25.

In the body of this Territory of Manaſſeh, but ſomewhat nearer to Jordan than to the Mediterranean Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Therſa, whoſe King was one of thoſe that Joſhua ſlew; which the Kings of Iſrael uſed for their Regal Seat, till ſuch time as Samaria was built. From hence the Wife of Jeroboam went to Achia to enquire of her Son's health; who knowing her, tho ſhe were diſguiſed, told her of her Son's death.

Jerom names it from Aner the Confederate of Abraham, Gen. 14. 13. Joſ. 12. 17. 1 King. 14.

The ſecond was Thebes near Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt and Greece, of great fame; in the aſſault of the Tower of this Town, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Baſtard Abimilec was wounded by a weighty ſtone, thrown by a Woman over the Wall; who deſpairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to ſlay him out-right, becauſe it ſhould not be ſaid that he periſhed by the ſtroke of a Woman. But others ſet this City in Ephraim, near Sichem or Neapolis.

Jud. 9. 54.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territory adjoining is called Acrabatena, (one of the ten Toparchies, or Governments in Judea) for which Jerom, 1 Maccab. 5. reads Arabathena; but in the Greek it is Acrabatine: Iſidore calls it Agrabat. This City had one of the largeſt Territories of all Paleſtine, belonging to the Governour thereof. Joſephus remembreth it often, as in his ſecond Book of the Jews Wars, c. 11, 25, 28. and elsewhere.

The difference between a Tetrarchie and a Toparchie, was, that the first was taken for a Province, and the other for a City, with some lesser Territory adjoining; and a Tetrarch is the same with Praes in Latin, and President in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdom, and therefore so called. Pliny nameth 17 Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had four, and so hath the Kingdom of Ireland to this day, Lempster, Ulster, Connath, and Munster.

Plin. l. 5.

Euseb. in Cron.

To the South-west of Acrabata, they place the Cities of Balaam, or Bilham, and Gethremmon of the Levites: but Junius out of Josh. 21. 25. and 1 Chron. 6. 70. gathers, that these two are one; and that Jibleham, Josh. 16. 11. is another name of the same City.

Then is Jezrael a Regal City, set at the foot of the Mountains of Gilboe, towards the South-west: herein Jezabel, by a false accusation, caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end she might possess his Vineyard joining to the City; which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his Inheritance from his Father. Joram also was cast unburied into the same field;

1 King. 21. for which his Mother Jezabel murdered Naboth.

Toward the Sea, from Jezrael, is the City which they call Gaber; in whose ascent, as Ahaziah King of Juda fled from Jehu, when he had slain Joram, he was wounded with the shot of an Arrow, of which wound he died at Mageddo adjoining. The 2 King. 9. 27. Scripture calls this City of Gaber, Gur.

Then Adadremmon, near unto which the good King Josias was slain by Necho King of Egypt, in a War unadvisedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Assyria against the King thereof, by the Commandment of God; whom Josias thought to resist in his Passage: it was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour City to Adadremmon was Maggeddo, often remembred in the Scriptures; whose

Jud. 1. 5. King was slain among the rest by Joshua; yet they

Jos. 12. 17. defended their City for a long time against Manasseh. The River which passeth by the Town, may perhaps be the same which Ptolomy calleth Chorseus: and not that of which we have spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that have described the Holy Land delineate no such River. Moore only sets it down in his Geography of the twelve Tribes: but the River which passeth by Maggedo, he understandeth to be but a Branch falling thereinto. Laicstan and Schrot make a great confluence of Waters in this place; agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges; Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanaac, by the Waters of Maggeddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the Torrent so called.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia even to Sebaste, or Samaria;

Strab. l. 16. Jos. l. 15. c. 13. Niger. and Strabo far beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Josephus calls Cæsaria Palestinæ, a City of Phœnicia: yea Laurentius Corvinus extendeth Phœnicia as far as Gaza: seeing also Ptolomy sets down Chorseus for the partition of Phœnicia and Judæa, this River running East and West parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Maggeddo, after the name of the City which it watereth, is the same which Ptolomy in his fourth Table of Asia, calleth Chorseus. The later travellers of the Holy Land call Maggeddo, Subimbre at this day.

¶. II. Of Cæsaria Palestinæ, and some other Towns.

FRom Maggeddo toward the West, and near the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious City of Cæsaria Palestina: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Pliny calls Apollonia: tho Ptolomy sets Apollonea elsewhere, and toward Egypt, between this City and Joppe, to which Vespasian gave the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod rebuilt, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the World: For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polish't Marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might look over the Seas far away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates, he forced a Harbor of great capacity, being in former times but an open Bay: and the wind blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables & Anchors. This work he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that kind hath not bin found in any Kingdom, nor in any Age: which, because the Materials were fetcht from far, and the weight of the stones was such, as it exceedeth belief, I have added Josephus's own words of this work, which are these: Hanc locorum incommoditatem correcturus, circulum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magna classi recipiendæ sufficere: & in viginti ulnarum profundum, prægrandia saxa demisit: quorum pleraque pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis verò octodecim, altitudine novem pedali: fuerunt quædam etiam majora, minora alia. To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Josephus) he compast in a Bay wherein a great Fleet might well ride: and let down great stones twenty fadom deep: whereof some were fifty foot long, 18 foot broad, and nine foot thick: and some bigger, and some lesser. To this he added an arm or cawse of two hundred foot long, to break the waves: the rest he strengthned with a Stone Wall, with divers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the Son in Law of Cæsar: in whose honour he intitled the City it self, Cæsaria of Palestine: all which he performed in 12 years time. It was the first of the Eastern Cities that received a Bishop: afterward erected into an Archbishoprick, commanding twenty others under it, saith Tyrius.

Jos. l. 15. c. 13.

L. 14. c. 12. Bell. sacr.

St. Jerom nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzorus, and Gelasius, to have been Bishops thereof. In this City was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by S. Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle. S. Paul was herein two years prisoner, under the President Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus: by whom, making his appeal, he was sent to Cæsar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalea, taking delight to be called a God by his flatterers; he was stricken by an Angel unto death, saith Josephus.

To the North of Cæsaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some read, Jos. 12. so called (saith Adricomius) because it joyneth to the Sea, whose King was slain by Joshua. But Junius, for in Naphoth Dor, reads in tractibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, although 1 Reg. 4. 11, for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephath Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Josua call it Nephith-Dor and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Jos. 12. 23. Judg. 1. 27.) may seem to be Dor. It was a strong and powerful City, and the fourth in account of those 12 Principalites, or Sitarchies, which Solomon erected. Junius upon Macc. 15. 11. placeth it between the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the River Chorseus: for so some name the River Corseus, of which we have spoken already.

Into this City, for the strength thereof, Typhon fled from Antiochus the Son of Demetrius, where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 120000 foot-Men, and 8000 Horse: the same perfidious villain that received 200 talents for the ransom of Jonath. Macchabeus (whom he had taken by treachery) and then slew him: and after him slew his own Master, usurping for a while the Kingdom of Syria. It had also a Bishops seat of the Dioceſs of Cæsaria.

From Cæsaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capharnaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Caparnaum famous in the Evangelists, they find in these parts near the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe, Hierome, in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgal, or Gilgal, was in Benjamin: but this Gilgal, they say it was, whose King was slain by Joshua.

Gal. Tyr. de Bell. sacr. l.10. c.6.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Machabees, it was called Caphar salama: in the Fields whereof Judas Macchabeus overthrew a part of the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an Army drawn into Judæa by a traiterous Jew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Priesthood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was St. Paul carried prisoner from Jerusalem, conducted by 470 Souldiers, to defend him from the fury of the Jews. In after-times the Army of Godfry of Bulloign attempted it in vain; yet was it taken by Baldwin. It was honoured in those days with a Bishops seat, but it is now a poor Village, called Assur, saith Brochard. Near unto this City the Prophet Jonas was three days preserved in the body of a Whale.

Mac. 17.31

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Roman, wasted with fire and Sword, because the Jews which dwelt at Cæsaria fled thence, and carried with them the Books of Moses. Near unto it is the Mountain of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab; wherein he hid an hundred Prophets, and fed them: after which he himself is said to have obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecy also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdom of Phœnicia.

§. I.

The Bounds, and chief Cities, and Founders, and Name, of this Kingdom: and of the Invention of Letters ascribed to them.

BEcause these five Tribes, of Asser, Nepthalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the half of Manasseh possest the better part of that ancient Kingdom of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus; I have therefore gathered a brief of those Kings which have governed therein: at least so many of them as time (which devoureth all things) hath left to posterity: and that the rest perished, it is not strange: seeing so many Volumes of excellent Learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of Estates, and Conquest of Heathen Princes, have been torn, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdom, as touching the South parts, are very uncertain: but all Cosmographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Casiotis, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomy makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Elutherus that falls into the Sea at the Island of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthosia, and stretching from thence along the coast of the Mediterran Sea, as far as the River of Chorseus; which seems to be that which the Jews call the Torrent, or River of Maggeddo. Pliny extends it further, and comprehends Joppe within it: Corvinus and Budæus, Joppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith Budæus) quæ nunc Palæstina Syria dicitur; It was called Phœnicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palæstina of Syria.

Ptol. 4. Tab. Asiæ.

Plin. l. 5. c. 19.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phœnicia all the Sea-side of Judea, and Palæstina, even unto Peluſium, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Cœlosyria, which he boundeth not. But for my self, I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomy's description, who was seldom deceived in his own Art. It had in it these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Islands) to wit, Aradus, Orthosia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Cæsaria Palestinæ: and by reason of its many Ports and goodly Sea-towns, it antiently commanded the Trade of the Eastern World: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea.

Strab. l. 16. Budæ. de Aſ. l. 4.

The ancient Regal Seat of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first Son of Canaan: and the people then subject to that Family were called Zidonians; the same state continuing even unto Joshua's time. For till then, it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region, afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Book of Vandal Wars. But in process of time the City of Tyre adjoyning, became the more magnificent: yet, according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built, and peopled.

Esay 23.

But after the death of Moses, and while Joshua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his Sons Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and possest the Cities of Tyre and Zidon, to wit, the new Tyrus; and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second Son) the use of Letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his Sister Europa, taught the Grecians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surprised Tyre, had stolen her thence: of which the Poets devised the fable of Jupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia; and finds Cadmus his Successor, whom he calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the Successors of Dido held that name always in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Asdrubaal, Hannibaal: whose memory Virgil also toucheth in these Verses.

F. 17.

Hic Regina gravem gemmis auroque popoſcit,
Impleviteq; moro pateram: quam Belus & omnes
A Belo, soliti.
The Queen anon commands the weighty Bowl
(Weighty with precious stones and massie Gold)
To flow with Wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grandfather to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the Son of Neptune by Libya the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Son of Telegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops his his time, ſaith S. Auguſtin, Moſes left Egypt: Agenors ſucceſſor living at once with Joſhua. Now that Agenor returned about the ſame time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither do I deny, but that he gave that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Son. But inſtead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both: and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchodonoſor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the ſame Nation, and brought up in Egypt: where he learnt the uſe of Letters (Egypt flouriſhed in all kind of Learning in Moſes's time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian; yet it is very likely that either he came to ſave his own Territory; or otherwiſe to defend the coaſt of Canaan from the Iſraelites, who were by Moſes led out of Egypt, to the great loſs and diſhonour of that Nation: and by Joſhua conducted over Jordan, to conquer and poſſeſs the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reaſon of the loſs which they received by the hand of God in the Red Sea, and by the ten Plagues caſt on them before that, and by the ſlaughter of ſo many of the male Children at the ſame time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by Land, which they knew had ſo many powerful Nations to defend it; the Deſerts interjacent, and the ſtrong Edomites, Emorites, and Ammonites their borderers: yet Egypt having ſuch Veſſels or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in uſe, did not in all probability neglect to gariſon the Sea-coaſt, or aſſiſt Agenor with ſuch forces as they had to ſpare; and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Philiſtims, which held the ſhores of Canaan next adjoyning unto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now, as it appeareth by the courſe of the ſtory; thoſe Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was ſaid to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended againſt Joſhua, and againſt the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Joſhua called the ſtrong City Accho, afterward Ptolomais, Achzib, and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in thoſe days. c.19.v.29.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty, eſpecially by Sea, it appears, firſt by their defence againſt Iſrael: Secondly, by this, that David & Solomon could not maſter them, but were glad of their alliance: Thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it ſelf thirteen years againſt a King of Kings, Nebuchodonoſor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, ſeemed unreſiſtable) ſpent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conqueſt of all the Cities in Aſia.

Other opinions there are, as that of Beroſus out of Joſephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the Son of Japhet. And for the Region it ſelf, though Caliſthenes derives it, ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greeks from the word Phonos of ſlaughter, becauſe the Phœnicians ſlew all that came on their coaſts; yet for my ſelf, I take it that Phœnix the Son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his Son in Greece, were the Inventers of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the diſpute unneceſſary.

The Ethiopians affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the firſt light of all thoſe Arts, Sciences, and civil Policies, which they afterward profeſt, and taught others: and that Pythagoras himſelf was inſtructed by the Lybians; to wit, from the South and ſuperiour Egyptians: from whom thoſe which inhabited nearer the out-let of Nilus, as they ſay, borrowed their Divinity and Philoſophy: and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received Civility. Again, the Phœnicians challenge this invention of Letters and Learning; acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither do they allow that Agenor and his Sons were Africians; whence Lucan,

Phœnices primi (fama ſi creditur) auſi,
Mandare rudibus vocem ſignare figuris. Lucan. l.3.
Phœnicians firſt (if fame may credit have)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the Son of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that anſwer made by Zeno; when he in a kind of reproach was called a Stranger, and a Phœnician.

Si patria eſt Phœnix, quid tum; nam Cadmus & ipſe Phœnix; cui debet Græcia docta libros. Athen. l. Dipſon.
If a Phœnician born I am, what then?
Cadmus was ſo: to whom Greece owes
The Books of learned Men.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Joſephus the Hiſtorian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians again ſubſcribe to none of theſe reports; but affirm conſtantly, that the great Zamolixis flouriſhed among them, when Atlas lived in Mauritania, Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt, and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, ſome of the French do not bluſh to maintain, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greeks the uſe of Letters, and other Sciences. And do not we know that our Bards and Druids are as ancient as thoſe Gauls, and that they ſent their Sons hither to be by them inſtructed in all kind of Learning? Joſ. contra Appionem.

Laſtly, whereas others beſtow this invention on Moſes: the ſame hath no probability at all; for he lived at ſuch time as Learning and Arts flouriſhed moſt, both in Egypt and Aſſyria, and he himſelf was brought up in all the Learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that Letters were invented by thoſe excellent Spirits of the firſt Age, and before the general Flood, either by Seth or Enos, or by whom elſe God knows; from whom all Wiſdom and Underſtanding hath proceeded. And as the ſame infinite God is preſent with all his Creatures, ſo hath he given the ſame invention to divers Nations; whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other, as well in this as in many other knowledges; for even in Mexico, when it was firſt diſcovered, there were found written Books after the manner of thoſe Hieroglyphicks, anciently uſed by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and ſo had thoſe Americans, a kind of Heraldry; and their Princes differing in Arms and Scutchions, like unto thoſe uſed by the Kings and Nobility of other Nations: Jura naturialia communia, & generalia, &c. Natural Laws are common, and general. Juriſcon.

§. II.

Of the Kings of Tyre.

BUt whatſoever remaineth of the Story and Kings of Phœnicia (the Books of Zeno, Sachoniatho, Manaſſeas, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the ſame is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Joſephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lived at once with Joſua, to whom ſucceeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and ſo far towards the North as Aradus, took the name of Phœnicia: what King ſucceeded Phœnix it doth not appear; but at ſuch time as the Græcians beſieged Troy, Phaſis governed Phœnicia.

In Jeremies time, and while Jehoiakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Jeremy ſpeaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of ſeveral Kings. c.27.v.3.

In

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Army wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as some Writers affirm, Xerxes's Fleet, or rather, as I suppose those 300 Gallies, which himself brought to his aid: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Jeremies time, they were subjected by Nebuchodonosor, of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembred, Jeremiah prophesied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeded Tetramnestus, remembred by D. Siculus in his fourteenth Book.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependency upon Darius, & that his Predecessors had served the East Empire against the Grecians. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were consumed 130 years and somewhat more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this Man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of restitution, because (saith Curtius) he rather submitted himself by the instigation of his subjects (who foresaw their utter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians. L.4.

Athen. *l.*12 *c.*13. Of this Strato, Athenæus, out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a Man of ill living, and most voluptuous; also that he appointed certain Games and Prizes for Women-Dancers and Singers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and assembled: that having beheld the most beautiful and lively among them, he might recover them for his own use and delights. Of the strange incident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, St. Hierome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were neer him with an Army too weighty for his strength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians, he determining to kill himself, but fainting in the execution, his Wife being present, wrested the Sword out of his hand, and slew him: which done, she also therewith pierced her own body, and died. Jerom. *l.*1. cont. Jovin.

After Alexander was possest of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, he gave the Kingdom to Hephestion to dispose of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen, no less vertuous than rich, desired Hephestion that this honour might be conferred on some one of the blood and race of their antient Kings: and presented unto him Balonimus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus; Justine, Abdolomius; and Plutarch, Alynomus: who at the very hour that he was called to this regal Estate, was with his own hands working in his Garden, setting herbs and roots, for his relief and sustenance: though otherwise a wise Man, and exceeding just.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose Estate being afterwards changed into Popular or Aristocratical, and by times and turns subjected to the Emperors of the East, there remaineth no further memory of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre: who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appear: Josephus the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith he garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of our Josepus and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be gathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians: but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesius, do in no sort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Josephus and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the same perchance that the Son of Sirach mentioneth in his forty and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians. C. 46.

To this Abibalus, Suron succeeded: if he be not one and the same with Abibalus. David (saith Eusebius out of Eupolemus) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psal. 83. *Prep. Evang. l.*9. *c.*4.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Josephus calls Irom, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, sometimes Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and sent him Cedars, with Masons and Carpenters, to persom his buildings in Jerusalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Solomon; whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great sums of Mony, but also he joyned with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Solomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and lent him 120 Talents of Gold. Of this Hiram, there is not only mention in divers places of Scripture, but in Josephus's Antiquities, the 7. and 8 Chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his third book, in Tatianus his Oration against the Greeks: and in Zonaras, Tome the first. This Prince seemeth to be very mighty and magnificent; he despiseth the twenty Towns which Solomon offered him: he defendeth himself against that victorious King David: and gave his Daughter in marriage to Solomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Asteroth, the Idol of the Phœnicians. Hiram lived 53 years. 2 Sam. 5. &c. 2 Sam. c. 5. 1 King. c. 1. 9. 20. 1 Chron. 14. 2 Chron. 2. 8, 9. 1 King. 11.

Balastartus, whom Theop. Antiochenus calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned seven years, according to Josephus. Theoph. 17 years.

Abdastartus the eldest Son of Baleastartus, governed nine years, and lived but twenty years according to Josephus: but after Theophilus, he reigned twelve years, and lived 54 who being slain by the four Sons of his own Nurse, the eldest of them held the Kingdom twelve years.

Astartus Brother to Abdastartus, recovered the Kingdom from this Usurper, and reigned twelve years.

Astarimus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third Brother, followed Astartus, and ruled nine years, and lived in all fifty four. Joseph 54 Theoph. 58.

Phelles the fourth Son of Baleastartus, and Brother to the three former Kings, slew Astarimus, and reigned eight Months, and lived fifty years. Theoph.

Ithobalus (or Juthobalus, in Theophilus) Son to the third Brother Astarimus, who was the chief Priest of the Goddess Astarta, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his Father, and slaughtered his Uncle Phelles: and reigned thirty two years, the same which in the first of Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose Daughter Jezebel Achab married. Joseph. 32 Theoph. 12.

Badezor, or Bazor, the Son of Ithobalus, or Ethbaal, Brother to Jezebel, succeeded his Father, and reigned six years, and lived in all forty five. 1 King. 16. v. 31. Joseph. 6 Years.

Mettimus succeeded Badezor, and reigned but nine years (saith Josephus) he had two Sons, Pygmalion, and Barca, and two Daughters, Elisa and Anna. Theoph. 26. Joseph. 9. Theoph. 29.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettimus his Father forty Years, and lived fifty six. In the seventh Year of whose reign, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143 Years and 8 Months after the Temple of Solomon: which by our account was 289 Years after after Troy was taken, and 143 before Rome; and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido must be far out of square. For Pygmalion covetous of Sicheus his riches, who had married his Sister Eliſa, ſlew him traiterouſly as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we believe Juſtin and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Eliſa fearing to be diſpoiled of her Husbands Treaſure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforeſaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to purſue, he was by his Mothers tears, and by threats from the Oracle arreſted. Barca accompanied his Siſter, and aſſiſted her in the erection of Carthage: and from him ſprang that noble Familiy of the Barcæ in Africa, of which race deſcended many famous Captains, and the great Haanibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, becauſe of her manlike acts: others from Jedidia, a ſurname of Solomon.

Elulæus ſucceeded Pygmalion, and reigned thirty ſix Years: the ſame that overthrow the Fleet of Salmanaſſer, in the Port of Tyre: notwithſtanding which he continued his ſiege before it on the Land ſide five Years, but in vain.

After Elulæus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himſelf to be as wiſe as Daniel: and that he knew all ſecrets (ſaith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his twenty eight Chapter: out of whom it is gathered, that this Prince died, or was ſlain in that long ſiege of Nebuchodonoſor: who ſurrounded and attempted Tyre thirteen Years together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned ten Years a tributary, perchance, to Nebuchadonoſor: for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, ſucceeding each other: Firſt by Ecnibalus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Prieſt, Mittonus, and Geraſtus, who held it among them ſome ſeven Years, and odd Months: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one Year: after him Merbalus ſent from Babylon four Years; after him Iram, ſent thence alſo twenty Years. In the ſeventeenth of whoſe reign Cyrus began to govern Perſia.

§. III.

Of Boſius his conceit, that the Edumeans inhabiting alongſt the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledg of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdom and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a diſcourſe of divers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a Tract at large, intituled, De ruinis Gentium. And although the great and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea in all things under Heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who only is unchangeable and the ſame for ever; yet whereas the ſaid Bozius, inforcing here-hence, that the proſperity and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forſaking the true Religion; to prove this his aſſertion, ſuppoſeth the Tyrians to have been Edumeans, deſcended from Eſau Jacobs Brother: firſt, it can hardly be believed that Tyre, when it flouriſhed moſt in her ancient glory, was in any ſort truly devout and religious. But to this end (beſides the proof which the Scriptures give of Hirams good affection, when Solomon built the Temple) he brings many conjectural Arguments; whereof the ſtrongeſt is their pedigree and deſcent: it being likely in his opinion, that the poſterity of Eſau received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Iſaac. That the Tyrians were Edumeans, he endeavours to ſhew, partly by weak reaſons painfully ſtrained from ſome affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others, witneſs, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Iſlands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Zidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the Cities of Phœnicia. Conſidering therefore that all the coaſt of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumeans: as Elah and Eſiongaber, or under the Amalekites who deſcended of Amalec the Nephew of Eſau, whoſe chief City was Madian, ſo called of Madian the Son of Abraham by Cethura, whoſe poſterity did people it: the conſequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the Children of Iſrael. Hereunto he adds, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the Worſhip of Aſtartis the Idol of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecides being Phœnicians, themſelves differed much in their Philoſophy from the Idolatrous cuſtoms of the Greeks. That in Teman, a Town of the Edumeans, was an Univerſity, wherein, as may appear by Eliphas the Temanite, who diſputed with Job, Religion was ſincerely taught.

Boz. de ruin. Gent. l. 5. c. 7.

Such is the diſcourſe of Bozius, who labouring to prove one Paradox by another, deſerves in both very little credit. For, neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumeans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumeans at all. In what Religion Eſau brought up his Children, it is no where found written, but that himſelf was a profane Man, and diſavowed by God, the Scriptures in plain terms expreſs. That his Poſterity were Idolaters, is directly proved in the twenty fifth Chapter of the ſecond Book of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetual enemies to the Houſe of Iſrael, ſave only when David & ſome of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in ſubjection, who knows not? or who is ignorant of David's unfriendly behaviour amongſt them, when firſt they were ſubdued? ſurely, it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance between Tyrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held ſuch good correſpondence with David; even then when Joab ſlew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Iſrael, that the Edomites were ſo ill intreated. It ſeemeth that the piety and ancient wiſdom of Eliphaz the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumeans puniſhed, for being ſuch as David in his own days found them. Although indeed the City of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reaſon with Job, is not that in Edumea, but another of the ſame name, lying Eaſt from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoyning to Hus, the Country of Job: and to Sueh the City of Bildad the Shuit; as both ſuch Choreographers who beſt knew thoſe parts, do plainly ſhew, and the holy Text maketh manifeſt. For Job is ſaid to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wiſdom all the People of the Eaſt; not the Inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Paleſtina. True it is, that Elephaz the Son of Eſau had a Son called Teman: but that Fathers were wont in thoſe days to take name of their Sons, I no where find. And Iſhmael alſo had a Son called Thema: of whom it is not unlike, that Theman in the Eaſt had the name: for as much as in the ſeventh Chapter of the Book of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the Eaſt are called Iſhmaelites. He that well conſiders how great and ſtrong a Nation Amalec was, which durſt give battel to the Hoſt of Iſrael, wherein were 600000 able men, will hardly believe that ſuch a people were deſcended from one of Eſau his grand-children. For how powerful and numberleſs muſt the forces of all Edom have been, if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had been ſo great?

great? ſurely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoining could not have held them. But we no where find that Edom had to do with Amalec, or aſſiſted the Amalekites, when Saul went to root them out. For Amalec, is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it ſelf, if diſtinct from the Iſhmalites. The like may be ſaid of Midian, that the Founder thereof being Son to Abraham by Cethura, doubtleſs was no Edomite. And thus much in general for all the Seigniory of the Red Sea coaſt, which Bozius imagines the Edumæans to have held: if the Edomites in after-times held ſome places, as Elan and Eſiongaber on the Red Sea ſhore, yet in Moſes's time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moſes himſelf ſaith, that Iſrael did compaſs all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian ſtood, Moſes muſt needs have known it: becauſe he had ſojourned long in that Country: and there had left his Wife and Children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjectural Arguments, how probable ſoever are needleſs in ſo manifeſt a caſe. For in the 83 Pſalm, Edom, Amalec and Tyre, are named as diſtinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors ſhew, and Bozius himſelf confeſſeth, were Canaanites, as appears, Gen. 10. 15, 19. appointed by God to have been deſtroyed, and their Lands given to the Children of Aſſer, Joſ. 29. becauſe they were ever Idolaters, and of the curſed Seed of Canaan, not Couſins to Iſrael, nor profeſſors of the ſame Religion. For though Hiram ſaid, Bleſſed be God that hath ſent King David a wiſe Son: we cannot infer that he was of David's Religion. The Turk hath ſaid as much of Chriſtian Princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Sidonians then worſhiped Aſteroth, and drew Solomon alſo to the ſame Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the Temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great proviſion of Corn and Oyl, and the offer of twenty Towns and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly conſider things, it will appear that Hiram in all points dealt Merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is over-peſterd, being otherwiſe apt to yield Silks: as the Andarine Silks which come from thence, and other good Commodities. For Corn and Oyl, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well ſpare to Solomon. Alſo Gold for Land: wherein Solomon was the wiſer; who having got the Gold firſt, gave to Hiram the worſt Villages that he had; with which the Tyrian was ill pleaſed. But it was a neceſſary Policy, which inforced Tyrus to hold League with Iſrael. For David had ſubdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates: through which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and recarry their Wares on Camels, to their Fleets on the Red Sea, and back again to Tyrus: So that Solomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to paſs, could have cut off all their Trade.

But the Iſraelites were no Seamen, and therefore glad to ſhare with the Tyrians in their Adventures. Yet Solomon, as Lord of the Sea-towns, which his Father had taken from the Philiſtims, might have greatly diſtreſſed the Tyrians, and perhaps have brought them even into ſubjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvel) that Solomon rather meant as a Man of Peace to employ his Father's Treaſure in magnificent Works, than in purſuing the Conqueſt of all Syria. Therefore he willingly aided him, and ſent him cunning Workmen, to increaſe his delight in goodly Buildings, Imageries, and Inſtruments of Pleaſure.

As theſe Paſſages between Solomon and Hiram, are no ſtrong Arguments of Piety in the Tyrians: ſo thoſe other Proofs which Bozius frames Negatively upon particular Examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no Man knows. It ſeems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchaſed Divine Honours: which his Daughters, Nephews, and others of his Houſe obtained, but his own many Misfortunes beguiled him of ſuch hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but ſingle Examples. Every ſalvage Nation hath ſome whoſe Wiſdom excelleth the Vulgar, even of civil People. Neither did the moral Wiſdom of theſe Men expreſs any true knowledg of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece; whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good Argument to ſay, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not known to have taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Utica, Leptis, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which, I think, the Iſlands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their firſt beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were ſo likewiſe.

This their Idolatry, from Solomon's Time onwards, is acknowledged by Bozius, who would have us think them to have been formerly a ſtrange kind of devout Edomites. In which fancy he is ſo peremptory, that he ſtileth Men of contrary Opinion, impios politicos; as if it were impiety to think that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not known his Name, doth favour Vertue, and hate Vice) hath often rewarded moral Honeſty, with temporal Happineſs. Doubtleſs this Doctrine of Bozius, would better have agreed with Julian the Apoſtata, than with Cyril. For if the Aſſyrians, Greeks, Romans, and all thoſe Nations of the Gentiles, did then proſper moſt, when they drew neareſt unto the true Religion: What may be ſaid of the foul Idolatry which grew in Rome, as faſt as Rome it ſelf grew; and was inlarged with ſome new Superſtition, almoſt upon every new Victory? How few great Battels did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to ſome new God, or ſome new Honour to one of their old Gods? Yea, what one Nation, ſave only that of the Jews, was ſubdued by them, whoſe Gods they did not afterward entertain in their City? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman Majeſty. Shall we hereupon inforce the lewd and fooliſh concluſion, which Heathen Writers uſed againſt the Chriſtians in the Primitive Church; That ſuch Idolatry had cauſed the City of Rome to flouriſh; and that the decay of thoſe Abominations, did alſo bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought ſo, if Proſperity were a Sign or Effect of true Religion. Such is the blind Zeal of Bozius, who writing againſt thoſe whom he falſly terms Impious, gives ſtrength to ſuch as are impious indeed. But ſuch indiſcretion is uſually found among Men of his humour; who having once either fooliſhly imbraced the Dreams of others, or vainly faſhioned in their own Brains, any ſtrange Chimæra's of Divinity, condemn all ſuch in the pride of their Zeal, as Atheiſts and Infidels, that are not tranſported with the like intemperate Ignorance.

Great

Great pity it is, that such mad Dogs are oftentimes incouraged by those, who having the command of many Tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a Man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious virtue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim; and of the Kings of the Ten Tribes, whose Head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable Places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

HAving now past over Phœnicia, we come to the next Territory adjoining; which is that of Ephraim, sometime taken, per excellentiam, for the whole Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second Son of Joseph; whose Issues, when they left Egypt, were in number 45000; all which dying in the Deserts, (Joshua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their Children, grown to be able Men, 32500, who sat down on the West side of Jordan, between Manasseh and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan and the Mediterranean Sea, did by the East and West.

Psal. 59. 78, 108. Par. 25.

The first and chief City which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdom of Israel, built by Amris, or Homri, King thereof, and seated on the top of the Mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottom, and as far as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of Augustus Cæsar. This City is often remembred in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first Building; for as Brochard observeth, the Ruins which yet remain, and which Brochard found greater than those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble Pillers, with other hewen and carved Stone, in great abundance, among the Rubbish.

It was beaten to the ground by the Sons of Hyrcanus the High Priest: restored and built by the first Herod, the Son of Antipater; who, to flatter Cæsar, called it Sebaste. Herein were the Prophets Heliseus, and Abdias buried; and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Græcian Monks.

Near Samaria towards the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a Town of that name; on the top of which Mountain Jeroboam erected one of his Golden Calves to be worshipped; with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountain of Bethel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the Restauration called Neapolis, now Peloſa, and Napolasa: It was destroyed by Simeon and Levi, in revenge of the ravishment of their Sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec evened with the Soil. Jeroboam raised it up again; and the Damascens a third time cast it down.

Sichar. Joh. 4. 5. Mabor-than. Joseph. 11 Ant. 1.

Under Sichem, towards the Sea, standeth Pharaton, or Pirhaton, on the Mountain Amelec, the City of Abdon Judg of Israel. And under it Bethoron of the Levites, built, as it is said, by Sara, the Daughter of Ephraim. Near to this City, Judas Maccabæus overthrew Seron and Lysias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This City had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Judg. 12. 15. 2 King. 13.

Between Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Josh. 10. and Saron, whose King was slain by Joshua: it is also mentioned Acts 9. 35. And of this Saron the Valley taketh name; which beginning at Cæsaria Palestina, extendeth it self alongst the Coast as far as Joppe, saith Adrichome. Tho indeed the Name Sarona is not particularly given to this Valley, but to every fruitful plain Region; for not only this Valley is so called, to wit, between Cæsaria and Joppe, but that also between the Mountain Tabor and the Sea of Galilee; for so St. Jerom, upon Esay 35. interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father, in his Commentaries upon Abdia, read Saron for Assaron; understanding thereby a Plain near Lidda: which Lidda, in his time, was called Diospolis, or the City of Jupiter, one of the Topharchies of Judea, the fifth in dignity, (or the third after Pliny) where S. Peter (non sua sed Christi virtute) cured Æneas. Niger calls all that Region, from Antilibanus to Joppe, Sarona. This Joppe was burnt to the ground by the Romans, those Ravens and Spoilers of all Estates, disturbers of Common-Weals, usurpers of other Princes Kingdoms: who with no other respect led, than to amplify their own Glory, troubled the whole World: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most salvage and barbarous Nations.

Acts 9. Luke 23. Niger. Comm. 4. Asiæ. fol. 503. 14.

In Diospolis (saith Will. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose Honour and Memory, Justinian the Emperor caused a fair Church to be built over his Tomb: these be Tyrius his words; Relicta à dextris locis maritimis Antipatride, & Joppe, per latè patentem planitiem Eleutheriam pertranseuntes, Liddam quæ est Diospolis, ubi & egregii Martyris Georgii usq; hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, pervenerunt, ejus Ecclesiam quam ad honorem ejusdem Martyris pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Justinianus multo studio & devotione prompta ædificari præceperat, &c. They having left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Towns Antipatris and Joppe, passing over the great open Plain of Eleutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diospolis, where the sumptuous Tomb of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed: whose Church, when the Godly and Orthodox Prince of the Romans, High and Mighty Justinian, had commanded to be built, with great earnestness and present devotion, &c. Thus far Tyrius, by whose Testimony we may conjecture, that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria, but rather some better Christian; for this of Alexandria, was slain there in an uproar of the People, and his Ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus Reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian than he is commonly thought: for his words of the

Of this S. George see more above in this second Book. c. 7. §. 3. ¶. 5.

Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulcher ſtand? occaſioned the uproar of the People againſt him, as fearing leſt he would give attempt to overthrow that beautiful Temple. This alſo Marcellinus reports; who tho he ſays that this Georgius was alſo deadly hated of the Chriſtians, who elſe might have reſcued him: yet he addeth, that his Aſhes, with the Aſhes of two others, were therefore caſt into the Sea, leſt if their Reliques had been gathered up, Churches ſhould be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather think that it was not this Georgius, whoſe Name lives in the right honourable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius, above-cited, witneſſeth to have been buried at Lidda, or Dioſpolis. The ſame alſo is confirmed by Vuriac. S. Jerom affirms that it was ſometime called Tigrida; and while the Chriſtians inhahited the Holy Land, it had a Biſhop Suffragan.

Salig. Tom. 6. *c.*4.

Near to Lidda, or Dioſpolis, ſtandeth Ramatha of the Levites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama, or Ramula, the native City of Joſeph, which buried the Body of Chriſt. There are many places which bear this name of Rama: one they ſet in the Tribe of Juda near Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Naphtalim, not far from Sephet; a third in Zabulon, which, they ſay, adjoineth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the ſame with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama in the Hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel lived, and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the North, alongſt the Coaſt, are Helon, or Ajalon of the Levites, of which 1 Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Joſephus in his Antiquities, and in the Wars of the Jews. Alſo Balſaliſa (for which Junius, 2 Reg 4.42. reads planities Shaliſtæ) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim: but Junius, upon 1 Sam. 9. where we read of the Land of Shaliſha, findeth it in Benjamin.

On the other ſide the Mountains of Ephraim, ſtandeth Gofna, one of the Toparchies, or Cities of Government, the ſecond in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-ſara, or, according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach; one alſo of the ten Toparchies or Præſidencies of Judæa, which they call Thamnitica; a goodly City and ſtrong, ſeated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim, on the North of the Hill called Gaas; which City and Territory Iſrael gave unto their Leader Joſhua; who alſo amplified it with Buildings, near which he was buried. His Sepulcher remained in S Jerom's time, and over it the Sun ingraven, in memory of that greateſt of Wonders which God wrought in Joſhua's time.

In the Places adjoining ſtandeth Adarſa, or Adaſa; where Judas Macchabæus, with 3000 Jews, overthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria, near to Gaſer, or Gezer, which Joſhua took, and hung their King, a City of the Levites. It was afterwards taken by Pharaoh of Egypt; the People all ſlain, and the City razed: Solomon rebuilt it.

Then that high and famous Mountain and City of Silo, whereon the Ark of God was kept ſo many years, till the Philiſtims got it.

See in Benjamin.

To this they join the City of Machmas, or Michmas, in which Jonathas Macchabæus inhabited; a place often remembred in the Scriptures. It ſtandeth in the common way from Samaria towards Jeruſalem, and is now called Eyra.

Then the Village of Najoth where Saul prophe-ſied; and near it Ephron, one of thoſe Cities which Abijah recovered from Jeroboham, after the great overthrow given him. Then Kibtſaim of the Levites, of which *Joſh.*21.22. which Junius thinks to be the ſame with Jokmeham, of which 1 Chron. 6. 28. As for Abſalom's Baalaſar, which they find hereabout, Junius reads it the Plain of Chatſor; and finds it in the Tribe of Juda; as Joſh 15. we read of two Chatzors in that Tribe, one near Kedeſh, v. 23. and the other the ſame as Chetzron, v. 25. toward Jordan.

1 Kings 4. and ſee Rama in Benjamin.

In this Tribe alſo they find the City of Mello; whoſe Citizens, they ſay, joined with the Sichimites in making the Baſtard Abimelec King: adding, that for the building thereof, with other Cities, Solomon raiſed a Tribute upon the People. But it ſeems that Mello, of Millo, is a common name of a ſtrong Fort or Citadel: and ſo Junius for domus Millo, reads incolæ munitionis; and for Salomo ædificabat Millo, he reads, ædificabat munitionem; and ſo the Septuagint read τὴν ἀνοδον in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Solomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hieruſalem.

Upon the top of one of the higheſt of theſe Hills of Ephraim, which over-looketh all the Plains on both ſides of Jordan, they find the Caſtle called Dok; which they make to be the ſame with Dagon, of which Joſeph. 1. *Bell. Alſo in this Tribe they place the River of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great Droughth, where he was ‖ fed by the Ravens: and after that the River was dried up, he travelled (by the Spirit of God) towards Sidon, where he was relieved by the poor Widow of Zarepta, whoſe dead Son he revived, and increaſed her pittance of Meal and Oil, whereby ſhe ſuſtained her Life.

§. II.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes, from Jeroboam to Achab.

OF the first Kings of Israel, I omit in this place to speak, and reserve it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Juda; of whom hereafter.

Touching the Acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes; but briefly, beginning after the division from Juda and Benjamin, now it followeth to speak. The first of these Kings was Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda; who being a Man of strength and courage, was by Solomon made Overseer of the Buildings of the Millo or Munition in Jerusalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, and so many of them as wrought in those Works. During which time, as he went from Jerusalem, he incountred the Prophet Ahijah; who made him know that he was by God destined to be King of Israel, and to command ten of the twelve Tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Solomon's knowledg, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Osochores, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertain Adad the Idumæan, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his Captain Joab; which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wives Sister Taphnes; using both him and Jeroboam as Instruments to shake the Kingdom of Judæa, that himself might the easlier spoil it; as he did: for in the fifth year of Rehoboam, Shishack sack'd the City of Jerusalem, and carried thence all the Treasure of David and Solomon, and all the Spoils which David took from Adadezer of Soba, with the presents of Tohu, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value. 1 Reg. 14.

This Jeroboam, after the death of Solomon, became Lord of the ten Tribes: and tho he were permitted by God to govern the Israelites, and from a mean Man exalted to that state: yet preferring the Policies of the World, before the Service and Honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes under his Rule should repair to Jerusalem to do their usual Sacrifices, they might be drawn from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship, (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aaron's Calf in Horeb); further, he made election of his Priests out of the basest and unlearned People. This King made his chief Seat and Palace at Sichem: He despised the warning of the Judæan Prophet, whom Josephus calleth Adon, and Glycas, Joel: His Hand thereafter withered, and was again restored; but continuing in his Idolatry, and hardned, upon occasion that the Prophet returning was slain by a Lion, Ahijah makes him know, that God purposed to root out his Posterity. Ambrose on Rom. 1.

He was afterward overthrown by Abia King of Juda, and died, after he had governed 22 Years; whom Nadab his Son succeeded: who in the second year of his Reign, together with all the Race of Jeroboam, was slain, and rooted out by Baasha, who reigned in his stead; so Nadab lived King but two years. 1 King. 11, 12, 13, 14. 1 King. 15. 27, &c.

Baasha the Son of Ahijah, the third King after the Partition, made War with Asa King of Juda: he seated himself in Thersa, and fortified Rama against Juda, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Naphtalim, and destroyed many places therein: the mean while Asa carried away the Materials, with which Baasha intended to fortify Rama; but being an Idolater, he was threatned by Jehu the Prophet, that it should befal his Race, as it did to Jeroboam; which afterward came to pass. He ruled 24 years, and died. 1 King. 15. & 16.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his Son, who at a Feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his Cups slain by Zambris, after he had reigned two years: and in him the Propheſy of Jehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and assumed the Name of a King seven days: But Ambris, in revenge of the King's Murder, set upon Zambris, or Zimri; and incloſed him in Thersa, and forc'd him to burn himself. 1 King. 16.

Ambris, or Homri, succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regal Seat from Thersa to Samaria, which he bought of Shemer, built, aad fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater, no less impious than the rest; and therefore subjected to Tabremmon King of Syria; the Father of Benhadad, according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras. But how this should stand, I do not well conceive; seeing Benhadad the Son of Tabremmon, was invited by Asa King of Juda, to assail Baasha King of Israel, the Father of Ela who forewent Ambris. This Ambris reigned twelve years, six in Thersa, and six in Samaria, and left two Children, Achab, and Athalia. 1 King. 16. 1 King. 15.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the Captivity of the ten Tribes.

ACHAB, or Ahab, succeeded Omri, who not only upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians; but he married Jezabel the Zidonian; and as Jeroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian; and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Jezabel to kill the Prophets of the most High God. God sent Famine on the Land of Israel. Achab met Elias; Elias prevailed in the trial of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false Prophets, and afterward flieth for fear of Jezabel.

Benhadad, not long after, besieged Samaria; and taken by Achab, was by him set at liberty: for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michæas) reproveth him: afterward he caused Naboth, by a false Accusation, to be stoned. Then joining with Josaphat in the War for the recovery of Ramoth; he was slain, as Michæas had foretold him.

He had three Sons named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Joram, and Joas; besides seventy other Sons by sundry Wives and Concubins.

Ochosias succeeded his Father Achab. The Moabites fell from his Obedience: he bruised himself by a fall; and sent for Counsel to Beel-zebub the God of Acharon. Eliah the Prophet meeteth the Messenger on the way; and misliking that Ochozias sought help from that dead Idol, asked the Messenger, If there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captains, and with each fifty Souldiers to bring Eliah unto him; both which, with their Attendants, were consumed with Fire. The third Captain besought mercy at Eliah's hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King; avowing it to the King that he must then die: which came to pass in the second year of his reign. Beelzebub was the same with Belus and Pluto, saith Viginere upon Livi. 2 King. 1.

Joram the Brother of Ochozias by Jezabel, ſucceeded: He allured Joſaphat King of Juda, and the King of Edom, to aſſiſt him againſt the Moabites, who refuſed to pay him the Tribute of 20000 Sheep. The three Kings wanted Water for themſelves and their Horſes in the Deſarts. The Prophet Eliſha cauſeth the Ditches to flow. 2 King. 3. The Moabites are overthrown; their King flieth to Kirharaſeth; and being beſieged, according to ſome Expoſitors, burnt his Son on the Walls as a Sacrifice, whereat the three Kings moved with compaſſion, returned and left Moab, waſting and ſpoiling that Region. Others, as it ſeems with better reaſon, underſtand the Text to ſpeak of the Son of the King of Edom, whom they ſuppoſe in this irruption to have been taken Priſoner by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab ſhewed him over the Walls, threatning, unleſs the Siege were diſſolved, that he would offer him in Sacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the King of Edom beſought thoſe of Juda and Iſrael, to break off the Siege for the ſafety of his Son: which when the other Kings refuſed to yield unto, and that Moab, according to his former threatning, had burnt the King of Edom's Son upon the Rampire, that all the Aſſailants might diſcern it: The King of Edom being by this ſad Spectacle enraged, forſook the party of the other Kings; for want of whoſe aſſiſtance the Siege was broken up.

After this the King of Aram ſent to Joram, to heal Naaman the Captain of his Army of the Leproſy. The anſwer of Joram was; Am I God to kill, and to give Life, that he doth ſend to heal a Man from his Leproſy? adding, that the Aramite ſought but matter of quarrel againſt him. Eliſha hearing thereof, willed the King to ſend Naaman to him; promiſing that he ſhould know that there was a Prophet in Iſrael; and ſo Naaman was healed, by waſhing himſelf ſeven times in Jordan. Eliſha refuſed the Gifts of Naaman. But his Servant Gehazi accepted a part thereof; from whence the ſellers of ſpiritual Gifts are called Gehazites, as 2 King. 1. 5. the Buyers are Simonians, of Simon Magus.

Afterward Benhadad, King of Aram or Damaſcus, having heard that this Prophet did diſcover to the King of Iſrael whatſoever the Aramite conſulted in his ſecreteſt Council, ſent a Troop of Horſe to take Eliſha: all whom Eliſha ſtrook blind, and brought them Captives into Samaria; Joram then asking leave of the Prophet to ſlay them; Eliſha forbad him to harm them, but cauſed them to be fed, and ſent back to their own Prince in ſafety.

The King of Aram, notwithſtanding theſe Benefits, did again attempt Samaria; and brought the Citizens to extream famine. Joram imputeth the cauſe thereof to the Prophet Eliſha. Eliſha, by Prayer, cauſed a noiſe of Chariots and Armour to ſound in the Air, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the Siege; an act of great admiration, as the ſame is written in 2 Kings 7. After this, when Aziel obtained the Kingdom of 2 King. 7. Syria by the death of his Maſter; Joram entring upon his Frontire, took Ramoth Gilead; in which War he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezrael to be cured. But whilſt he lay there, Jehu (who commanded the Army of Joram in Gilead, was anointed King by one of the Children of the Prophets ſent by Eliſha) ſurprized and ſlew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole Poſterity of Ahab.

Jehu, who reigned after Joram, deſtroyed not only the Race of his Foregoers, but alſo their Religion, for which he received a promiſe from God, That his Seed ſhould occupy the Throne unto the fourth Generation. Yet he upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous War, wherein he was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who ſpoiled all the Countries to the Eaſt of Jordan; in which War he was ſlain, ſaith Cedrenus; whereof the Scriptures are ſilent. Jehu Pag. 86. raigned 28 years.

Joachaz, or Jehoahaz, the Son of Jehu, ſucceeded his Father, whom Azael and his Son Benhadad often invaded, and in the end ſubjected, leaving him only 50 Horſe, 20 Chariots, and 1000 Foot; 2 King. 13. and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like Duſt beaten into Powder. Joachaz reigned 17 years.

After Joachaz, Joas his Son governed Iſrael; who when he repaired to Eliſha the Prophet, as he lay on his Death-bed, the Prophet promiſed him three Victories over the Aramites: and firſt commanded him to lay his hand on his Bow; and Eliſha covered the King's hands with his, and bad him open the Window weſtward (which was toward Damaſcus) and then ſhoot an Arrow thence out. He again willed him to beat the ground with his Arrows, who ſmote it thrice and ceaſed. The Prophet then told him, that he ſhould have ſmitten five or ſix times; and then he ſhould have had ſo many victories over the Aramites as he gave ſtrokes. And ſo it ſucceeded with Joas, who overthew the Aramites in three Battels, and recovered the Cities and Territory from Benhadad the Son of Azael, which his Father Joachaz had loſt. He alſo overthrew Amazia King of Juda, who provoked him to make the War; whereupon he entred Jeruſalem, and ſacked it, with the Temple. This 2 King. 14. Joas reigned 16 years, and died; in whoſe time alſo the Prophet Eliſha exchanged this Life for a better.

Jeroboam, the third from Jehu, followed Joas his Father, an Idolater as his Predeceſſors: but he recovered all the reſt of the Lands belonging to Iſrael, from Hamath, which is near Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned 41 years.

Zacharias, the fourth and laſt of the Houſe of Jehu, ſlain by Shallum his Vaſſal, who reigned in his ſtead, governed ſix months. Shallum held the Kingdom but one month, being ſlaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem, who took revenge of Shallum, uſed great cruelty to thoſe that did not acknowledg him; ripping up the Bellies of thoſe that were with Child. This Menaham being invaded by Phul, bought his Peace with ten thouſand Talents of 2 King. 16. Silver; which he exacted by a Tribute of fifty 19. Shekels from every Man of Wealth in Iſrael. Menahem governed 20 years.

Pekahiah, or Phaceia, or, after Zonaras, Phaceſia, ſucceeded; and after he had ruled two years, he was ſlain by Phaca, or Pekah, the Commander of his Army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekah's time, Phulaſſar, or Tiglat-Phylaſſar, invaded the Kingdom of Iſrael, and won Jion, Abel-Bethmaaca, Janoach, Kedeſh, Haſor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them Captives 2 King. 15. into Aſſyria: he was drawn in by Achas King of 29. Judah, againſt Pekah and Rezin, the laſt of the Adades. For Achas being waſted by Pekah of Iſrael, and by Rezin of Damaſcus, did a third time borrow the Church Riches, and therewith engaged the Aſſyrian, who firſt ſuppreſſed the Monarchy of Syria and Damaſcus, and then of Iſrael; and this inviting of the great Aſſyrian, was the utter ruin of both States, of Iſrael and of Judah. Pekah reigned 20 years.

Then Hoſhea, or Oſea, who ſlew Pekah, became the Vaſſal of Salmanaſſar; but hoping to ſhake off the the Assyrian Yoke, he sought aid from So, or Sua, or Sebicus King of Egypt: which being known to the Assyrian, he cast him into Prison, besieged Samaria, and mastered it; carried the ten idolatrous Tribes into Nineveh in Assyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Eastern Regions, and there dispersed them: and replanted Samaria with divers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthe, (inhabiting about Cutha, a River in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding upon Syria, and with those of Sepharvajim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia upon Euphrates, of whose Conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Ava; which were of the ancient Avins, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abraham's time, dwelling near unto Gaza, whom the Caphtorims rooted out; and at this time they were of Arabia the Desart, called Havei; willing to return to their ancient Seats. To these he added those of Chamath or Ituæa, the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassals of the Aduds of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Assyrian advise himself better than the Romans did: For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Judæa and Jerusalem, they carried the people away captive; but left no others in their places, but a very few simple Labourers, besides their own thin Garisons, which soon decayed: and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who never could be driven thence again to this day.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable Places of Dan, Simeon, Judah, Reuben, Gad, and the other half of Manasseh.

§. I.

Of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Towns.

NOw following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, joineth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which Family there were numbred at Mount Sinai, 62700 fighting Men, all which leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their Sons 66400 bearing Arms. The first famous City in this Tribe on the Sea coast was Joppe, or Japho, as in Joshua 19. one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that Coast, because it was the Port of Jerusalem. From hence Jonas imbarked himself when he fled from the service of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this City received many changes: and while Judas Macchabæus governed the Jews, the Syrians that were Garisoned in Joppe, having their Fleet in the Port, invited 200 principall Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Judas revenged by firing their fleet, and putting the Companies which fought to escape to the Sword.

V. 46.

Mac. 2. 12.

It was twice taken by the Romans, and by Cestius the Lieutenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the year of Christ 1250, Lodowick the French King gave it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turks, and called Jaffa. There are certain Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported that Andromeda was fastned with Chains, and thence delivered from the Sea-Monster by Perseus. This Fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Josephus, Solinus, and Pliny. Marcus Scaurus during his Office of Ædileship, shewed the Bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome upon Jonas speaks of it indifferently.

L. 3. 1. 15. de bel. Jud. Solin. c. 47. Plin. l. 5. c. 9.

The next unto Joppe was Jamnia, where Judas Macchabæus burnt the rest of the Syrian Fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seen at Jerusalem, 240 furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishop's Seat, saith Will. of Tyre; But there is no sign of it at this time that such a place there was.

2 Mac. 12.

De Bell. sacr

After Jamnia, is the City of Geth or Gath, sometime Anthedon, saith Volaterran. And so Montanus seems to understand it. For he sets it next to Ægypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Anthedon. But Volaterran gives neither reason nor authority for his oppinion; for Ptolomy sets Anthedon far to the South of Joppe: And Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixteen miles from Joppe, where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the Habitation and Seminary of the Anakims: strong and Giant-like-men, whom Joshua could not expel, nor the Danites after him; nor any of the Israelites, till David's time: who slew Goliath, as his Captains did divers others, not much inferiour in strength and stature unto Goliath.

F. 244.

Hieron. in Michæam.

Rehoboam the Son of Solomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the Son of Amazia destroyed it again. It was also laid waste by Azael King of Syria. Fulk the fourth King of Hierusalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruins. Whether this

Geth

L.21.c.18. Geth was the ſame that Will. of Tyre in the Holy War calls Ibjilin, I much doubt; the error growing by taking Gath for Anthedon.

Not far from Geth, or Gath, ſtandeth Bethſemes, or the Houſe of the Sun. In the Fields adjoining to this City (as is thought) was the Ark of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned looſe by the Philiſtims: and the Bethſemites preſuming to look therein, there were ſlain of the Elders 70, and of the People 50000, by the ordinance of God. After which ſlaughter, and the great lamentation of the People, it was called the great * Abel, ſaith S. Hierome. Benedictns Theologus finds three other Cities of this name; one in † Napthalim, another in Juda; and another Iſſachar; Hierome finds a fifth in Benjamin.

1 Sam. 6. 18.

* Or rather not the City it ſelf, but the great ſtone in the field; upon which ſtone the Philiſtims ſet the Ark, the change being eaſy from Eben, or Aben, which ſignifieth a ſtone, to Abel, which ſignifieth Mourning.

Keeping the Sea-coaſt, the ſtrong City of Accaron offereth it ſelf, ſometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philiſtims. S. Hierome makes it the ſame with Cæſaria Palæſtina. Pliny confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of thoſe that defended it ſelf againſt the Danites and Judæans. It worſhipped Beel-zebub the God of Hornets, or Flies. To which Idol it was that Ahaziah King of Iſrael ſent to enquire of his health: whoſe Meſſengers Eliah meeting by the way, cauſed them to return, with a ſorrowful anſwer to their Maſter. This City is remembred in many places of Scripture.

† See in Napth.c.7. §.4. ¶.6. 2 King.1.

Chriſtianus Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron, or Ekron. This Azotus, or Aſdod, was alſo an habitation of the Anakims, whom Joſhua ‖ failed to deſtroy, though he once poſſeſt their City. Herein ſtood a ſumptuous Temple, dedicated to the * Idol Dagon: the ſame Idol which fell twice to the ground of it ſelf, after the Ark of God was by the Philiſtims carried into their Temple: and in the ſecond fall it was utterly broken and defaced. Near it was that famous † Judas Machabæus ſlain by Bacchides and Alcimus, the Lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Jonathas: and the reſt of the Citizens being put to the Sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon were, with their Idol therein, conſumed with Fire: near which alſo he overthrew Apollonius.

‖ It was beſieged by Pſammetichus the Father of Pharaoh. Necco for 29 years together; whence Jer. 25. 20. ſpeaks of the reſidue of Aſhdod, to wit, the greateſt part having periſhed in this Siege.

Gabinius the Roman rebuilt it. It had a Biſhop's Seat while Chriſtianity flouriſhed in thoſe parts. But in S. Hierom's time it was yet a fair Village. And this was the laſt of the Sea-Towns within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eaſtward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountain of Æthiopia, wherein Philip the Apoſtle baptized the Eunuch, are Tſorah, or Sarara, and Eſthaol, and between them Caſtra Danis near Hebron: though this place where Sampſon was born, may ſeem by the words, Jud. 18. 12. to be in the Tribe of Judah, as the other alſo were bordering Towns between Dan and Juda.

After theſe, within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they find Gedor: or, as it is, 1 Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cendebæus the Lieutenant of Antiochus fortified againſt the Jews, and near which himſelf was by the Macchabees overthrown.

Mac. 1. 15, 16.

Then Modin, the Native City of the Macchabees; and wherein they were buried, on whoſe Sepulcher the ſeven Marble Pillars, which were erected of that heigth, as they ſerved for a Mark to the Seamen, remained many hundreds of years after their firſt ſetting up, as Brochard and Breidenbach witneſs.

There are, beſides theſe, the City of Cariathiarim, that is, the City of the Woods: ſeated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the Ark of God remained twenty years in the Houſe of Aminadab; till ſuch time as David carried it thence to Hieruſalem: Of this place (as they ſay) was Zacharias the Son of Barachias, or Jehoida, who was ſlain between the Temple and the Altar: alſo Urias, whom Joachim King of Jeruſalem ſlaughtered, as we find in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather as I take it upon preſumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Caſpin, taken with great ſlaughter by Judas Macchabæus: and Lachis, whoſe King was ſlain by Joſhua, in which alſo Amazia was ſlain: The ſame which Senacherib took, Ezechias raigning in Juda.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, ſee in Joſhua 19. from the Verſe 41. where alſo it is added, that the Danites Portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Leſhem, and inhabited it: which City, after amplified by Philip the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Cæſarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Iturea, and Trachonitis: of which Coaſts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this City ſee more in Napthalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountains of fame.

It hath two Rivers or Torrents: the Northermoſt riſeth out of the Mountains of Juda: and paſſing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of Sorek, or Sored, whoſe Banks are plentiful of Vines, which have no ſeeds or ſtones: The Wine they yield is red, of excellent colour, taſte, and ſavour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, ſo called from the River, inhabited Dalila whom Sampſon loved.

§. II.

The Tribe of Simeon.

THe Tribe of Simeon takes up the reſt of the Sea-coaſt of Canaan, to the border of Ægypt; who being the ſecond Son of Jacob by Lea, there were increaſed of that Family, while they abode in Ægypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai 59300 able Men; all which ending their Lives in the Deſarts, there entred the Land of Promiſe of their Iſſues 22200 bearing Arms, who were * in part mixed with Juda, and in part ſevered, inhabiting a ſmall Territory on the Sea-coaſt, belonging to Edumæa; of which the firſt City adjoining to Dan, was Aſcalon.

* And therefore no marvel that divers places named Joſ. 15. in the large portion of Juda, be reckoned in this Tribe: ſee Joſ. 19. 1, 9 where thus much is expreſly noted.

The Reguli, or petty Kings thereof, were called Aſcalonita; of which Volaterran out of Xanthus, in the Hiſtory of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Aſcalus were the Sons of Hymenæus: and that Aſcalus being imployed by Aciamus King of the Lydians, with an Army in Syria, falling in love with a young Woman of that Country, built this City, and called it after his own Name: the ſame hath Nicolaus in his Hiſtory, ſaith Volaterran.

Volat. Geog. l. 11. fol. 244.

Diodorus Siculus, in his third Book, remembreth a Lake near Aſcalon, wherein there hath been a Temple dedicated to Derceto the Goddeſs of the Syrians; having the Face of a Woman, and the Body of a Fiſh: who, as I have ſaid before, in the ſtory of Ninus, was the Mother of Semiramis, fained to be caſt into this Lake, and fed and relieved by Doves. And therefore was the Dove worſhipped, both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palæſtino ſancta Columba Syro.
The white Dove is for holy held, in Syria-Palæſtine.

It

Vol. ut supra.

It was one of the chiefeſt and ſtrongeſt Cities of the Philiſtims. It bred many learned Men (ſaith Volaterran) as Antiochus, Soſus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Hiſtorian, and Artemidorus who wrote the Story of Bithynia.

In Aſcalon, as ſome ſay, was that wicked Herod born, that ſeeking after our Saviour, cauſed all the Male-children, of two years old and under, to be ſlain. In the Chriſtian times it had a Biſhop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made War in the Holy Land, gave it a new Wall, and many Buildings. Ejus muros cùm Saladinus diruiſſet, Richardus Anglorum Rex inſtauravit, ſaith Adrichomius.

Adrich. in Trib. Simeon.

In David's time it was one of the moſt renowned Cities of the Philiſtims; for he nameth Gath and Aſcalon only, when he lamenteth the death of Saul, and Jonathan; not ſpeaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publiſh it not in the ſtreets of Aſcalon; it is now called Scalone. Gabinius reſtored it, as he did Azotus and Gaza.

2 Sam. 1.

Next to Aſcalon ſtood Gaza, or Gazera, which the Hebrews call Hazza; the Syrians, Azan; of Azonus (as they ſay) the Son of Hercules. Other prophane Writers affirm, that it was built by Jupiter. Pomp. Mela gives the building thereof to Cambyſes the Perſian, becauſe belike he rebuilt it; and Gaza in the Perſian tongue, is as much as to ſay, Treaſure. This Gaza was the firſt of the five Satrapies of the Philiſtims, and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this City was far more ancient than Cambyſes, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb; but the ſtrength of the Anakims put him from it. At ſuch time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Perſia, it received a Garriſon for Darius: in deſpight whereof, it was by the Macedonians, after a long ſiege, demoliſhed, and was called Gaza of the Deſart.

Alexander Janneus King of the Jews ſurpriſed it, and ſlew 500 Senators in the Temple of Apollo, which fled thither for Sanctuary; but this Gaza was not ſet up in the ſame place again, to wit, on the Foundations which Alexander Macedon had overturned, but ſomewhat nearer the Sea-ſide; tho the other was but two miles off. It was a Town of great account in the time of the Macchabees, and gave many wounds to the Jews, till it was forc'd by Simon: of which he made ſo great account, as he purpoſed to reſide therein himſelf; and in his abſence, left John his Son and Succeſſor to be Governor. In Brochard's time it was ſtill a goodly City, and known by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the River Bezor, ſtandeth Majoma the Port of Gaza: to which the Priviledg of a City was given by the great Conſtantine; and the place called Conſtance after the name of the Emperor's Son. But Julian the Apoſtate, ſoon after favouring the Gazeans, made it ſubject unto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza Maritima.

On the other ſide of Beſor, ſtandeth Anthedon, defaced by Alexander Janneus, reſtored by Herod, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the Favourite of Auguſtus.

Then Raphia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whoſe Torrent is known in the Scriptures by the name * of the Torrent of Ægypt, till the Septuagint converted it by Rinocura; to difference it, Eſay 27. 12. giving the name of the City to the Torrent that watereth it.

* Junius calls it Vallis Ægypti the name of the ſtream ſeems to be Shichor. See in Aſſer, Chap. 7. §. 3. ¶. 8. in the Margin.

Pliny calls it Rhinocolura; and Joſephus, Rhinocorura.

* Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the World was divided by Lots, between the three Sons of Noah.

Within the Land, and upon the River of Beſor, they place Gerar; which the Scripture placeth between Kadeſh and Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was near to the Wilderneſs of Berſheba, it appears, Gen. 20. 31. and therefore no marvel that as elſewhere Berſheba, ſo ſometime Gerar, be made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a diſtinct Kingdom from the Philiſtim Satrapies, the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs: S. Hierome ſaith, that afterward it was called Regio ſalutaris; The healthy Country: ſo that it was no marvel that Abraham and Iſaac lived much in theſe parts. Of King Aſa's Conqueſt of the Cities about Gerar, ſee 2 Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Siceleg, or Tſiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites; when David, in his flying from Saul to the Philiſtims, had left his Carriages there; but David followed them over the River of Beſor, and put them to the ſlaughter, and recovered the Prey.

1 Sam. 30.

Next Dabir, ſometime Cariath-Sepher, the City of Letters, the Univerſity, as they ſay, or Academy of old Paleſtine. In S. Jerom's time it ſeems it had the name of Daema: Joſh. 15. 49. it is called Urbs Sannæ, from the name, as it ſeems, of ſome of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Urbs Arbahi. For even hence alſo were theſe Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othoniel, incouraged by Caleb's promiſe of his Daughter in Marriage: but that Joſhua and the Hoaſt of Iſrael were at the Surpriſe, it appears Joſh. 10. 39. This City, Joſh. 21. 15. is named among thoſe, which out of Simeon and Juda, were given to the Levites. And hence it ſeems they attributed it to this Tribe.

Joſep. 10, 11, 12.

Joſ. 11. 21.

Beſides theſe, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of leſs fame; as Hajin, of which Joſh. 19. 7. which alſo Joſh. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simeon (for which Junius thinks Haſham is named 1 Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Joſhua theſe two are diſtinguiſhed) alſo Tholad ſo named, 1 Chron. 4. 29. for which Joſh. 19. 4. we have Eltholad. Chatzar-Suſa, ſo named, Joſh. 19. 5. for which Joſh. 15. we have Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in ſignification; for Gadda, is Turma, and Suſa, Equitatus.

* And alſo 1 Chron. 4. 32.

In the ſame places of Joſhua, and of the Chronicles, Chorma is named; which they think to be the ſame with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites purſued the Iſraelites. But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountains of Edumæa. For Iſrael fled not that way, but back again to the Camp, which lay to the South of Edumæa, in the Deſart.

Deut. 1.

The ſame places alſo name Beerſheba in this Tribe; ſo called of the Oath between Abraham and Abimelech; near unto which Hagar wandred with her Son Iſhmael.

Gen. 21. 31

It was alſo called the City of Iſaac, becauſe he dwelt long there.

While the Chriſtians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to ſtrengthen this place, ſtanding on the Border of the Arabian Deſart, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gabelin.

The other Cities of Simeon, which are named in the places of Joſhua, and of the Chronicles, above noted, becauſe they help us nothing in ſtory, I omit them.

In

In the time of Ezekiah King of Juda, certain of this Tribe being ſtreightned in their own Territories, paſſed to * Gedor, as it is 1 Chron. 4. 39. (the ſame place which Joſh. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederothaima) which at that time was inhabited by the Iſſue of Cham; where they ſeated themſelves: as alſo five hundred others of this Tribe, deſtroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountains of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

* As it ſeems in the Land of Juda. See in the firſt Paragraph of this Chapter, in the Cities of Dan.

Jud. 16. 3.

The Mountains within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampſon the chiefeſt; unto which he carried the Gate-poſt of Gaza. The Rivers are Beſor, and the Torrent of Egypt called Shichor, as is noted in Aſſer.

§. III.

The Tribe of Juda.

OF Juda, the fourth Son of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600; all which (Caleb excepted) periſhed in the Deſarts. And of their Sons, there entred the Land of Canaan 76500 bearing Arms. Agreeable to the greatneſs of this number, was the greateſt Territory given, called afterward Judæa; within the bounds whereof, were the Portions allotted to Dan, and Simeon included.

And many Cities named in theſe Tribes, did firſt, as they ſay, belong unto the Children of Juda, who had a kind of Soveraignty over them; as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Bethſemes, Tſiglag, Beerſheba, and others.

The multitude of People within this ſmall Province (if it be meted by that ground given to this Tribe only) were incredible, if the Witneſs of the Scriptures had not warranted the Report. For when David numbred the People, they were found five hundred thouſand fighting Men.

The Cities of Juda were many: But I will remember the chiefeſt of them; beginning with Arad, or Horma, which ſtandeth in the entrance of Judæa from Idumæa: whoſe King firſt ſurprized the Iſraelites, as they paſſed by the Border of Canaan towards Moab; and took from them ſome Spoils, and many Priſoners: who being afterward overthrown by the Iſraelites, the Sons of Keni, the Kinſmen of Moſes, obtained a Poſſeſſion in that Territory: who before the coming of the Iſraelites, dwelt between Madian and Amalek.

Numb. 21. 3. Joſ. 12. 14. Jud. 1. 16.

Following this Frontier toward Idumæa and the South, Aſcenſus Scorpionis, or Acrabbim is placed, the next to Arad; ſo called, becauſe of Scorpions which are ſaid to be in that place: from which name of Acrabbim, Jerom thinks that the name of the Toparchie, called Acrabathena, was denominated; of which we have ſpoken in Manaſſes.

Num. 34. 4 Deut. 8. 15.

On the South ſide alſo of Judæa, they place the Cities of Jagur, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Aſhna, Jethnam, and Aſor, or Chatſor, moſt of them Frontier Towns.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places ſo called: one beſides this in the body of Juda, of which the Deſart and Forreſt adjoining took name; where David hid himſelf from Saul.

After theſe are the Cities of Eſron, Adar, Karkah, and Aſemona, or Hatſmon, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idumæa, towards the North, we find the Cities of Danna, Shemah, Amam, the other Aſor, or Chatſor, Behaloth, and the two Socchoes: of all which, ſee Joſh. 15. alſo Carioth, by Joſh. 15. 25. called Kerioth: whence Judas the Traitor was called Iſ-carioth, as it were a Man of Carioth. Then Hetham the abode of Sampſon, which Rehoboam reedified. Beyond theſe, towards the North border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the City of Jethar, or Jatthir, belonging to the Levites. In S. Jerom's time it was called Jethita, and inhabited altogether with Chriſtians: Near unto this City was that remarkable Battel fought betwixt Aſa King of Juda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the Field a Million of fighting Men; and was notwithſtanding, beaten and put to flight: Aſa following the Victory as far as Gerar, which at the ſame time he recovered.

Not far from Jether, ſtandeth Jarmuth, whoſe King was ſlain by Joſhua, and the City overturned. Next unto it is Mareſa, the native City of the Prophet Michæa: Between it and Odolla, Judas Macchabæus overthrew Gorgias; and ſent thence 10000 Dragmas of Silver to be offered for Sacrifice.

2 Mac. 12 35.

Odolla, or Hadullam it ſelf, was an ancient and magnificent City, taken by Joſhua, and the King thereof ſlain. Jonathas Macchabæus beautified it greatly. Then Ceila, or Keila, afterward Echela, where David ſometime hid himſelf, and which afterward he delivered from the Aſſaults of the Philiſtims: near which the Prophet Abacuc was buried; whoſe Monument remained, and was ſeen by S. Jerom.

Gen. 38. 1. Joſ. 12. 15. 1 Sam. 23. 1.

Near it is Hebron, ſometime called the City of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Cariatharbe; the reaſon of this name they give, as if it ſignified the City of four; becauſe the four Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, were therein buried; but of Adam it is but ſuppoſed; and it is plain by the places, Joſh. 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Arbah here doth not ſignify four, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants, called Anakim, whoſe Son, as it ſeems, Anak was: and Achiman, Sheſhai, and Talmai (whom Caleb expelled, Joſh. 15.) were the Sons of this Anak, Numb. 13. 23. The name of Anak ſignifieth Torquem, a Chain worn for ornament: and it ſeems that this Anak, enriched by the Spoils which himſelf and his Father got, wore a Chain of Gold, and ſo got this Name: and leaving the Cuſtom to his Poſterity, left alſo the Name: ſo that in Latin the name of Anakim, may not amiſs be expounded by Torquati.

The City Hebron was one of the ancienteſt Cities of Canaan; built ſeven years before Tſoan, or Tanis in Egypt: and it was the head and chief City of the Anakims, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part given; to wit, the Villages adjoining, and the reſt to the Levites. It had a Biſhop in the Chriſtian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Conſtantine.

Not far hence they find Eleutheropolis, or the free City, remembred often by S. Jerom. Then Eglon, whoſe King Dabir aſſociated, with the other four Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Jeruſalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, and Lachis, beſieging the Gibeonites, were by Joſhua utterly overthrown. From henee the next City of fame was Emaus, afterward Nicopolis, one of the Cities of Government, or Preſidencies of Judæa. In the ſight of this City, Judas Macchabæus (after he had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gave a third overthrow to Georgias Lieutenant to Antiochus.

Joſ. 10. 11. 1 Macc. 3. 4.

In the year 1301, it was overturned by an Earthquake, ſaith Euſebius. In the Chriſtian times it had a Biſhop's Seat, of the Dioceſs of Cæſaria of Paleſtine.

From

From Emaus towards the West Sea there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader, or Gedera, or Gederothaima, of which, and of Gederoth * Jos. 15. v. 36. & 41. Then Azecha, to which Josua followed the Slaughter of the five Kings before-named, a City of great Strength in the Valley of ‖ Terebinth or Turpintine: As the Vulgar readeth, 1 Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it seems) they seat it near unto Soco, and unto Lebna of the Levites. It revolted from the Subjection of the Jews, while Joram the Son of Josaphat ruled in Jerusalem: And next unto this standeth Maceda, which Josuah utterly dispeopled.

* Also 1 Chron. 4. 39. as is above remembred in the Tribe of Simeon.

‖ Junius for in Valle Terebinth, hath in valle querceti. Vatablus keeps the Hebrew reading in valle Elah.

On the other side of Emaus, towards the East, standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethsora, and Bethsor; one of the strongest, and most sought for places in all Juda: It is seated on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the House on the Rock, or of strength.) It was fortified by Roboboam, and afterward by Judas Macchabæus. Lysias forc't it, and Antiochus Eupator by Famine: Jonathas regained it: And it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Bethleem is next unto it within six miles of Jerusalem, otherwise Lebem, sometime Ephrata; which Name, they say, it had of Caleb's Wife, when as it is so called by Moses before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this City was Abessan, or Ibzan, Judge of Israel, after Jephthah, famous for the thirty Sons, and thirty Daughters, begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethlemite, who with his Wife Naomi sojourned in Moab during the Famine of Juda, in the time of the Judges, with whom Ruth, the Daughter-in-Law of Naomi returned to Bethleem, and married Boaz, of whom Obed, of whom Isai, of whom David. It had also the Honor to be the native City of our Saviour Jesus Christ: And therefore shall the memory thereof never end.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a City of the same Name; and therefore was this of our Saviour called Bethleem-Juda.

Hieron. in comm. super Math. c. 2.

From Bethleem, some four or five miles, standeth Thecua, the City of Amos the Prophet: And to this place adjoyning is the City of Bethzacaria, in the way between Bethsura and Jerusalem; on whose Hills adjoyning the glorious guilt Shields of Antiochus shined like Lamps of Fire in the Eyes of the Jews. The City of * Bezek was also near unto Bethleem, which also Adoni-bezec commanded; who had, during his Reign, tortured seventy Kings, by cutting off the Joynts of their Fingers and Toes, and made them gather Bread under his Table: But at length the same end befel himself by the Sons of Juda, after they had taken him Prisoner.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great Estimation) we may pass by, until we come to the magnificent Castle of Herodium, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thereunto with 200 Marble Steps, exceeding beautiful and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adjoyning to the Desart of Jeruel, between it and Tekoa, is that Clivus floridus, where in the time of Josaphat, the Jews stood and look'd on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, massacring one another, when they had purposed to joyn against Juda; near which place is the Valley of Blessing, where the Jews the fourth day after, solemnly came and blessed God for so strange Deliverance.

2 Chron. 20. v. 16. & 26.

Now the Cities of Juda which border the dead Sea, are these; Aduran beautified by Roboboam, and Tsohar, which the Vulgar calleth * Segor; so called, because Lot in his Prayer for it, urged that it was but a little one; whence it was called Tsohar, which signifieth a little one; when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romans times it had a Garrison, and was called (as they say) Pannier: In Hierom's time Balezona. Then Engaddi, or Hengaddi, first Asasonthamar; near unto which are the Gardens of Balsamum, the best that the World had called Opobalsamum: The most part of all which Trees, Cleopatra, Queen of Ægypt, sent for out of Judea; and Herod, who either feared or loved Anthony her Husband, caused them to be rooted up, and presented unto her; which she replanted near Heliopolis in Ægypt. This City was first taken by Chedorlaomer and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Judea, and one of the Presidencies thereof.

* Some call it Balsalisa, and Vitula conspernans. See in Gad. 10. § 5. post principium in Haroher. Gen. 19. 20. Hieron. in Ose. Hebr. Chatsatson-hamar. 2 Chron 20. 2.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Jesrael; not that which was the City of Naboth, of which already; but another of the same name, the City of Achinoan, the Wife of David, the Mother of that Amnon, whom Absalom slew: Also, as some think, the City of Amasa, Absalom's Lieutenant, and the Commander of his Army. But this seemeth to be an Error, grounded upon the nearness of the words, Israel, and Jesrael: And because the 2 Sam. 17. 25. Amasa's Father is called a Jesraelite, who first of the Chron. 2. 17. is called an Ismaelite: Indeed the Hebrew Orthography sheweth, that Amasa's Father is not said to be of the City Jesrael, but an Israelite in Religion, though otherwise an Ismaelite.

1 Reg. 21.

2 Sam. 17. 25.

In this Tribe there were many high Hills, or Mountains, as those of Engaddi upon the Dead Sea, and the Mountains of Juda, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end near Taphna; and these part Juda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron: At the Foot whereof, was that Oak of Mambre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham, which St. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree; and saith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountain, called Collis Achillæ, on the South side of Ziph; on the Top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old Castle, erected by Jonathas Maccabæus, and called Massada, garnished it with seven and twenty high and strong Towers; and therein left Armor and Furniture for an hundred thousand Men, being, as it seemeth, a place unaccessible, and of incomparable Strength.

Hieron. in loc. Hebr. & quæst. Hebr. Josep. 14. Ant. c. 20.

In the Valley afterward, called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis: This Country had four Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim and Gomorra, destroyed with Fire from Heaven for their unnatural Sins.

§. IV.

The Tribe of Reuben, and his Borders.

† I.

The Seats and Bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites won from Sehon, King of Hesbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacob's Sons inhabited, of whose Children there were numbred at Mount Sinai, 46000, who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possess the Land Promis'd 43700 bearing Arms. But before we speak of these or the rest that inhabited the East-side of Jordan, something of their Borderers, to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose Land in our Writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first, we are to remember, that out of Abraham's Kindred came many mighty Families; as by Isaac, and Jacob, the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jews: By Esau, or Edom, the Idumæans: By Ismael, the eldest Son of Abraham, the Ismaelites: And by Keturah, his last Wife, the Midianites. And again, by Lot, Abraham's Brother's Son, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: All which being but Strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possest by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them descended) these Issues and Alliances of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Ægypt, inhabited the Frontier Places adjoyning.

Esau and his Sons held Idumæa, which bounded Canaan on the South. Ismael took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea: Stretching his Possession over all Arabia Petræa, and a part of Arabia the Desart, as far as the River of Tigris, from Sur to Havilah.

Moab took the rest of the Coast of the Dead Sea, leaving a part to Midian; and passing over Arnon, inhabited the Plains between Jordan, and the Hills of Abarim, or Arnon, as far North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon sate down on the North-east side of Arnon, and possest the Tract from Rabba, afterwards Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilebad, and without them as far forth as Aroer, though in Moses's Time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: For the Amorites had thrust him over the River of Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the Border between the River of Jaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: All which Territory on the East-side of Jordan, and on the East-side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribe of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possest by the Emims, a Nation of Giants, weakned and broken by Chedorlaomer, after expulsed by the Moabites, as before remembred. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territory, and ancient Possession of the Zamzummims, or Zuræi, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlaomer, Amraphel, and the rest; and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Josua 13.

Num. 21. v. 24.

Gen. 14.

Now where it is written, that Arnon was the Border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sebon, or his Ancestor, beaten the Moabites out of the plain Countreys, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them thence from Hesbon over Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses Arrival upon that Border, when Vabeb governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab, when Moses past Arnon, was not the Son of Vabeb; but his Name was Balac, the Son of Zippor. And it may be, that those Kings were Elective, as the Idumæans anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab, between Arnon and Jordan, as far North as Essebon, was enhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrived there out of Ægypt, it was in the possession of Sebon, of the Race of Canaan, by Amoreus; and therefore did Jephthah, the Judge of Israel, justly defend the regaining of those Countreys against the claim of the Ammonites; because (as he allegded) Moses found them in the Possession of the Amorites, and not in the Hands of Moab, or Ammon, who (saith Jephthah) had three hundred years time to recover them, and did not: Whence he inferreth, that they ought not to claim them now.

Judg. 11.

And lest any should marvel why the Ammonites in Jephthah's time should make Claim to these Countreys; whereas Moses in the place, Numb. 21. verse 26. rather accounts them to have been the ancient Possession of the Moabites than of the Ammonites: It is to be noted, that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said, that the Iron Bed of Og was to be seen at Rabbath, the chief City of the Ammonites; it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him, or his Ancestors, got from the Ammonites, as much as Sebon's was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seated so confusedly together, that it was hard to distinguish them; so also were the Sons of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalec, and Ismael. Yet the Reason seemeth plain enough why Ammon commanded in chief in Jephthah's time: For sometimes the one Nation, sometimes the other of all those Borderers acquired the Sovereignty: And again, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the Mountains of Galaad or Gilebad, and as far South as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking Advantage of the time, they sought to recover it again. Yet at such time as Moses overthrew Sebon at Jahaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites all that part of their Possession which lay about Aroer, and between it and Jaboc. Sebon and Og, two Kings of the Amorites, having displanted both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountains. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. ver. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sebon, from Arnon to Jaboc, even unto the Children of Ammon; so as at this time the River of Jaboc was the South Bound of Ammon, within the Mountains; when as anciently they had also Possessions over Jaboc, which at length the Gadites possest; as in the thirteenth Chapter of Josuah. ver. 25. appears.

Jos. 13. 25. Junius notes, that the one half of the Land of Hammon, which in this place of Josuah is said to have been given to the Gadites, was taken first from the Ammonites by Sebon; but the place, Deut. 3. 11. proveth, that as well Og, as Sebon, had gotten Lands out of the hands of the Ammonites.

† II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THe chief Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of Warrant, readeth Fethson. The Vulgar, or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two verses 36, and 37. of 21 Jos. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing, slipt into Jethson.

Jos. 21. 37.

This City which they gave to the Levites, imparts her Name to the Desart adjoyning; from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sebon. In the same place of Josuah, where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Betser & villæ ejus, reads Bosor in solitudine Misor, without any Ground from the Hebrew: Whence Adrichomius makes a Town called Misor, in the Border between Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth, near the Dead Sea (for the Country between being Mountainous, hath few Cities) they place two Towns of Note, Lasa, or Leshah, of which Genes. 10. vers. 19. the Greeks call it Callirhoe; near which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet Water, all which, soon after their Rising, being joyned in one Stream, do make a very wholesom Bath, especially for all Contractions of Sinews:

Deut. 2. 26. It was a marginal Note out of Deut. 3. where the 70. kept the word Misor, signifying a Plain, which after crept into the Text. Joseph. 17. ant. c. 9. & Hieron. in quæst. Heb. in Gen.

news: To which Herod the Elder, when he was desperate of all other Help, repaired; but in vain. Others say, that these Springs arise out of the Hills of Machærus in this Tribe. The like Fountains are found in the Pyrenees, and in Peru, called, the Baths of the Inga's or Kings. The other Town is Machærus, the next between Lasa and Jordan, of all that part of the World the strongest In-land City and Castle, standing upon a Mountain, every way unaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Jannæus, who made it a Frontier against the Arabians; but it was demolished by Gabinius in the War with Aristobulus, (saith Josephus.) It was thither (saith Josephus) that Herod sent John Baptist, and wherein he was slain: His Army soon after being utterly overthrown by Aretas King of Arabia, and himself after this Murther never prospering. Not far from Machærus was Bosor, or Bozra, a Town of Refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and near it Livias upon Jordan, which Herod built in Honour of Livia, the Mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

To the North of Livias is Setim, or Sittim, where the Children of Israel embraced the Daughters of Midian, or Moab; and where Phineas pierced the Body of Zimri and Cosbi, with his Spear, bringing due Vengeance upon them, when they were in the midst of their Sin: And from hence Joshua sent the Discoverers to view Jericho, staying here until he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreams of, reading Joel 3. 18. irrigabit Torrentem Setim. The Vulgar hath torrentem spinarum; and Junius, vallem cedrorum; expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan, but for the Church, in which the just being placed, grow as the Cedars, Psal. 62. 13.

Jos. 3. 1.

The plain Countrey hereabout, by Moses, called the Plains of Moab, where he expounded the Book of Deuteronomy to the People, a little before his Death, is in the beginning of the same Book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South, it had the great Desart of Paran, where they had long wandred. On the East, it had Chatseroth, and Dizahab (of which two, the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomy in Palæstina, the later was a Tract belonging to the Nabathæi, in Arabia Petræa, where was * Mezahab, of which Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers, called Medava and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North, it had Laban (in Junius Edition, by the Fault of the Print, Lamban Deuteron. 1.1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias; and some confound it with Livias, of which even now we spake.

Dew. 34. 1.

* The same as it seems which Num. 21. 30. is called Medeba, whence we read of the Plains of Medeba, Jos. 13. v. 9, 16. of which also we read in the Wars of David against Hanum the Ammonite, 1 Chron. 19. 7. Also 1 Macc. 9. 36. Esa. 16. 2. See before c. 5. § 7.

Also on the same North side, towards the Confines of Cœlosyrea, it had Thophel, whereabout sometime Pella of Cœlosyria stoood; which was in the Region of Decapolis; and as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Butis. It is also noted in Moses to be over against, or near unto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea; as also Num. 2. 14. it translateth the word Suphah in like manner; whereas in this place of Deuteronomy, there is no Addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea; and yet the Scripture, when this Word is so to be taken, useth the Addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the Region of Suph, or Suphah, which doubtless was about these Plains of Moab, towards the Dead Sea; where the Countrey being full of Reeds, was therefore thus called: As also the RedSea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large Plains of Moab, where Moses made those Divine Exhortations, some say, was Bethabara, where John baptized, which in the Story of Gedeon, is called Beth-bara. Josephus says, it was where after the City Abila stood, near Jordan, in a place set with Palm-trees; which sure was the same as Abel-sittim, in the Plains of Moab, Num. 33. 49. (that some call Abel-sathaim, and Bel-sathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that part of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites encamping in the time of Moses. This place is also called Sittim; which Word, if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars than from Thorns, with Adrichomius and others. It was the Wood of which the Ark of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of these Plains of Moab, they place the Cities of Nebo, Baal-Meon, Sibma, and Hesbon, the chief City of Sehon and Elhael, and Kiriathaima, the Seat of the Giants Emim. Of the two first of these, Moses seems to give a Note, that the Names were to be changed, because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatry. For Nebo (instead of which Junius Es. 46. 1. reads Deus vaticinus) was the Name of their Idol-Oracle, and Baal-meon is the Habitation of Baal. Of the same Idol was the Hill Nebo in these parts denominated; from whose Top, which the common Translators call Phasgah, Moses, before his Death, saw all the Land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which Story Junius does not take Phasgah, or Pisgah, for any proper Name; but for an Appellative, signifying a Hill: And so also Vatablus, in some places, as Num. 21. 20. where he noteth, that some call Pisgah that Top which looketh to Jericho, and Hair, as it looketh to Moab, which Opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the Name of the City of Reuben, mentioned Jos. 13. 20, called Ashdoth-Pisgah, which is as much as decursus Pisgæ, to wit, where the Waters did run down from Pisgah. In the same place of Joshua, there is also named Beth-peor, as belonging to Reuben: So called from the Hill Peor, from whence also Baal, the Idol, was called Baal peor, which, they say, was the same as Priapus; the chief place of whose Worship seems to have been Bamoth-Baal; of which also Jos. 13. in the Cities of Reuben; for which Num. 22. 41. they read the high places of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balak first brought Balaam, to curse the Israelites.

What name they used for Nebo, it doth not appear; Baal-meon it seems they named sometime Baith, as Es. 15. 2. and sometime Beth-meon, Isai. 58 23.

Of divers Places Bordering Reuben, belonging to Midian, Moab, or Edom.

THere were besides these divers places of Note over Arnon, which adjoyned to Reuben; amongst which they place Gallim, the City of Phalti, to whom Saul gave his Daughter Michal from David: But Junius thinks this Town to be in Benjamin; gathering so much out of Isai. 10. ver. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Benjamin. With better Reason, perhaps, out of Num. 21. v. 29. we may say, that Mathana and Nahaliel were in these Confines of Reuben, through which places the Israelites past, after they had left the Well called Beer. Then Diblathaim, which the Prophet Jeremiah threatned with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

Jerem. 48.

Madian also is found in these parts; the chief of the Madianites in Moab; but not that Midian, or Madian by the Red Sea, wherein Jethro inhabited: For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding Overthrow by a Regiment of twelve thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the Plains of Moab, at such time as Israel began to accompany their Daughters. Their five Kings, with Balaam the South-sayer were then slain, and their Regal City, with the rest, destroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jethro was Prince, or Priest, forgot not the God of Abraham, their Ancestor; but relieved and assisted the Israelites in their painful Travels, through the Deserts, and were in all that Passage their Guides.

Esa. 16. 1. 1 Reg. 14. 7. In the South Border of Moab, adjoyning to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the Chief City of Edom, there is that Petra, which in the Scriptures is called Selah, which is as much as rupes or petra. It was also called Jocthеel, as appears by the place, 2 Reg. 14. It was built (saith Josephus) by Recem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites, slain, as before is said; after whom it was called Recem. Now they say, it is called Crac and Mozera.

Lib. 4. Ant. 7.

The Soldans of Ægypt, for the exceeding Strength thereof, kept therein all their Treasures of Ægypt and Arabia; of which it is the first and strongest City: The same, perhaps, which Pliny and Strabo call Nabathea, whence also the Province adjoyning took Name; which Name seems to have been taken at first from Nabaioth, the Son of Abraham, by Kethura. For Nabathea is no where understood for all Arabia Petræa (at least where it is not misunderstood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Judea. For Pharan, inhabited by Ismael, whose People Ptolomy calleth Pharanites, instead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumæans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og, King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petræa; though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desart belonged to the Amalekites and Ismaelites: All which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth, calleth Hagarims, of Hagar.

1 Chron. 5 v. 19, 20.

This City Petra, Scaurus besieged with the Roman Army; and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content, by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a Composition of Money, and to quit it. Yet Amasias, King of Juda (after he had slaughtered ten thousand of the Arabians in the Valley called Salinarum) wan also this City. St. Hierom finds Ruth the Moabite, to be natural of this City. In the time when the Christians held the Kingdom of Jerusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before been under the Greek Church. It is seated not far from Hor, where Aaron died; and on the other side, towards the North, is the River of Zared, or Zered, by which Moses encamped in the thirty eighth Station. Adrichome describeth the Waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zared and Arnon; and so he doth the Valley of Save: But the Waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it seems Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the Plains of Moab: And the Confluence of those Waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Save also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Save, or Shaveh, which is the King's Dale, where Absalom set up his Monument, as it seems, not far from Jerusalem. And at the same time Melchisedec, King of Salem, also encountred him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchisedec inhabiting, either near Bethsan, otherwise Scythopolis, in the half Tribe of Manasse, or in Jerusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: And therefore Save, which was also called the King's Dale, could not be in these parts.

Of the Dead Sea.

NOw, because the Sea of Sodom, or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the Salt-Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tiberias, which was fresh Water) also the Sea of the Wilderness, or rather the Sea * of the Plains, is often remembred in the Scriptures, and in this Story also; therefore I think it not impertinent to speak somewhat thereof: For it is like unto the Caspian Sea, which hath no Out-let, or Disburthening. The length of this Lake Josephus makes 180 Furlongs (which make two and twenty Miles and a half of ours) and about 150 in Breadth, which make eighteen of our Miles, and somewhat more. Pliny makes it a great deal less. But those that have of late Years seen this Sea, did account it (saith ‖ Weissenburg) eight Dutch Miles (which is two and thirty of ours) in length, and two and a half of theirs (which is ten of ours) in Breadth. Of this Lake, or Sea, Tacitus maketh this Report; Lacus est immenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptior, gravitate odoris accolis pestifer: neque vento impellitur, neque pisces aut suetas aquis volucres patitur, incertum undè superjecta ut solido feruntur, periti imperitique nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt Taste; of Smell infectious, and pestilent to the Borderers. It is neither moved, nor raised by the Wind, nor endureth Fish to live in it, or Fowl to swim in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the unskilful of swimming, as well as the skilfull, are born up by this Water. At one time of the Year it casteth up Bitumen; the Art of gathering which, Experience (the Finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the Trimming of Ships, and the like Businesses.

* So Junius reads for the Hebrew, Haraboth every where, and so also the Edition of Vatablus, Deut. 3. 17. though Deut. 4. 49. it hath mare solitudinis, as also 2 Reg. 14. 25. the reason of this name seems to be, because it joyns to the plains of Moab, which are called Araboth-Moab, Deut. 34. 1. as also we have Ceseloth in Habath, that is in the plains, to wit, of Zabulon, 1 Mac. 9. 2. whence Adrichomius imagines a City in Zabulon, called Araba. ‖ Descr. Ter. Sanct.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: "The Fields not far from this Lake, which "were sometime fruitful, and adorned with great "Cities, were burnt with lightning; of which "the Ruines remain, the Ground looking with "a sad Face, as having lost her Fruitfulness: For "whatsoever doth either grow, or is set thereon, "be it Fruits or Flowers, when they come to "Ripeness, have nothing within them, but moul-"der into Ashes: Thus far Tacitus. And it is found by Experience, that those Pomegranates, and other Apples, or Oranges, which do still grow on the Banks of this cursed Lake, do look fair, and are of good Colour on the Out-side; but being cut, have nothing but Dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake casteth up, it was by the Greeks called Asphaltitis. Vespasian, desirous to be satisfied of these Reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certain Captives to be cast into it, who were not only unskilful in swimming, but had their Hands also bound behind them; and notwithstanding, they were carried on the Face of the Waters, and could not sink.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Countrey within Arnon, Reuben possest.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Countrey (within Arnon) Reuben possest (though not taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in the 21. of Numbers, verse 14. nameth Vaheb, which seemeth to be the Ancestor, or Predecessor of Balac, the Son of Zippor, which Balac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For, fearing to contend with Moses by Arms, by the Examples of Sehon and Og, he hoped, by the help of Balaam's Cursings, or Enchantments, to take from them all Strength and Courage, and to cast on them some pestilent Diseases. And though Balaam at the first, moved by the Spirit of God, blest Israel, contrary to the Hope and Desire of Moab; yet being desirous in some sort to satisfie him, and to do him Service, he advised Moab to send Midianitish Women among the Israelites; hoping by them, as by fit Instruments of Mischief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen; but in the end, he received the Reward of his falling from God, and of his evil Counsel, and was slain among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

Num. 21. 22, 23, 24. Jos. 24.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named; saving that we find in the first of Chron. the fourth, that Jokim, and the Men of Chozeba, and Joash, and Sareph, all being of the Issue of Judah, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: But as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things, to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these Mens Governments are no where extant, or remaining: Or as others, hæc prius fuere; these Families of Judah were once thus famous: But now their Posterity chuse rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

V. 22.

Then we find Eglon King of Moab, who with the Help of Ammon and Amalec, mastered Israel, and commanded them eighteen Years; which Eglon, Ehud slew in his own House, and afterwards ten Thousand of his Nation. What Name the King of Moab had, unto whom David fled, fearing Saul, it doth not appear; or whether it were the same against whom Saul made War, it is not manifest; for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an Enemy to Saul, he received David, and relieved him, knowing that Saul sought his Life.

Judg. 3. 1 Sam. 22 1 Sam. 14

After this, David himself entred the Region of Moab; but not likely in the same King's time: For he slaughtered two parts of the People, and made the third part tributary: Whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pot, over Edom will I cast my Shoe; meaning, that he would reduce them to such an Abjection, and appoint them for base Services: And that he would tread down the Idumæans.

2 Sam. 8. 1 Chron. 18. Psal. 60. v. 10.

The next King, after David's Time, of the Moabites, whose Name liveth, was Mesha; who falling from Judah (perhaps in remembrance of the Severity of David) fastened himself to the Kings of Israel, and paid Tribute to Ahab 100000 Lambs, and 200000 Rams, with the Wooll: Who revolting again from Israel, after the Death of Ahab, was invaded by Jehoram; with whom joyned the Kings of Judah and Idumæa; and being by these three Kings prest and broken, he fled to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the King's Name; when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumæans invaded Jehosophat. And by reason of some private Quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumæans, and slaughtered them; and then one against another, so as Jehosophat had a notorious Victory over them all, without either Blood or Wound. Also in the time of Jeremiah the Prophet, there was a King of Moab, which is not named, which was after Mesha of Moab many Descents: For Mesha lived with Jehoram and this Moabite in Zedekia's time, fourteen Kings of Judah coming between, who wasted three hundred and odd years.

§ V.

Of the memorable Places of the Gadites, and the Bordering Places of Ammon.

THE Territory adjoyning to Reuben, is that of Gad; whereof all that part which joyned to the Mountains, was sometime in the Possession of the Ammonites, as far to the South as Aroer. Of the Children of Gad, the seventh Son of Jacob by Zelpha, the Hand-maid of Leah, there parted out of Ægypt, and died in the Desarts 45550. and of their Sons, there entered the Land promised 45000. bearing Arms: From the half Tribe of Manasseh, the River of Jabboc divided them: From Reuben, the Cities of Hesbon, Elhele and Aphec.

Gen. 30. Num. 1. 32. 26. Jos. 13.

The chief City of Gad, was Aroer, which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath-Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the Learned Junius, attending diligently to those Words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab Harahero, quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & Civitate ipsa quæ est in flumine; Where the City in the River is distinguished from the City upon the Bank of the River, (as also in like manner, Jos. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. v. 9.) thinketh, that Haroher, which doubtless belonged to the Gadites, (as Num. 32. 34. it is said, that they built it) was indeed seated near Har of the Moabites; but diverse from it. For that Har was never possest by Moses, it is plain, Deut. 2. 9. where God, forbidding Moses to touch it, saith, he hath given Har for an Inheritance to the Sons of Lot. Now that this City, which in divers places is said to be within, and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Haroher, which is said in the same places to be on the Bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites; the same Junius proveth out of Numb. 21. 15. where Arnon is said to be divided into divers Streams, where, or among which, Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jos. 13. 25. where Haroher is said to be seated before Rabbah; which Rabbah, as it seems, cannot be the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they seat not Haroher near it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbah, here we must understand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Ar or Har; and so we must needs distinguish it from Haroher. And as for * Har, (which also gave the Name to the Coast adjoyning) it seems it continued in the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the Giant-like people, called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlaomer, and his Associates: But Haroher, by the Interchange of Times, suffered many ancient Changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites; and from them, as it seems in the Story of Jephtha, by the Ammonites; and from the Ammonites again, by the Israelites, under the Conduct of Jephtha. In St. Hierom's Time, the greatest part of this City perished by an Earthquake, quake, as alſo Zoar in which Lot ſaved himſelf, in the deſtruction of Sodom, ſeated not far hence: which they ſay was therefore called Vitula conſternans, becauſe as a wanton tumbling Heifer, ſhe was thrice overthrown with Earth-quakes; for which cauſe alſo Hierom ſeems to think that this Zoar was called Saliſſa or Bal ſaliſſa, as if Bal had been a remainder of the old name Balah or Belah (of which Gen. 14. 2.) and Saliſſa which hath a ſignification of the ternary number, had alluded to the three Earth-quakes.

Gen. 14. 5. Jud. 11. 35. Hier. in Epitaph. Paul & in quæſt. & loc. Hebr. ſee Junius his annotations upon 1 Sam. 9. 2. where he makes Shaliſha a plain Country in Benjamin, and the ſame with Balſhaliſha, 2. Reg. 4. 42. where he expounds Bal or Baal to be as much as Plainties.

Brochard takes Haroher to be Petra, but erroniouſly, as before it is noted; ſeeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab, adjoyning to Edom, whereas Haroher is in the North-Eaſt border. Between Haroher and Jordan they ſeated Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, becauſe they are ſaid to have built it, Num. 32. 34. though Joſhua 13. v. 17. it is ſaid that Moſes gave it to the Reubenites. Of this City among the reſt of Moab, both Eſay and Hieremy propheſied, that it ſhould periſh; and the Lakes about it run with the Blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village near Arnon in Saint Hierom's time.

Eſay 15. Hier. 48.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer was Beth-nimrah, of which Eſay propheſieth, That the waters thereof ſhould be dryed up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not far from Beth-nimrah in this Tribe Adrichomius placeth Jogbeha, and Nobach or Nobe: of both which we read in the ſtory of Gedeon; and that Jogbeha was in Gad built by the Gadites, it appears Num. 32. 35. and therefore Nobach alſo muſt needs be in theſe parts: but whether in Gad or Manaſſe it is not certain; only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moſes witneſſeth. NOBACH alſo (ſaith he) went and took Kenath with her Towns, and called it Nobach of his own Name, where becauſe the verſes precedent ſpeak of the Manaſſites, and becauſe it is not likely that Moſes would have ſevered this ſeat of the Gadites from the reſt, of which he ſpake before v. 34, 35, 36. therefore it may ſeem that this * Nobach was in that part of Manaſſe, which was in the Eaſt of Jordan: though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he ſuppoſeth it to be the ſame with Nob, which Saul deſtroyed, of this we ſhall ſpeak ‖ in the Tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karkor where Zebach and Salmunah reſted themſelves in their flight from Gedeon, to which place Gedeon marched through this Nobach and Jogbeha, though ſome place it in Gad, and make it the ſame with Kir-chares, of which Eſay 15. and 2. Reg. 3. 25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the ſame with Kir-chares, it is certain that it was a principle City held ſtill by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witneſſeth, that to Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former ſimply called Hataroth, the latter Hatroth-Shophan: for which latter the Vulgar makes two Cities Roth and Shophan; the name Hataroth is as much as Coronæ.

Num. 32. 34, 35.

In the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon, together with Beth-nimrah, of which we have ſpoken, Joſhua c. 13. v. 27. nameth Beth-haram, and Succoth: the former Num. 32. 36. (where it is called Beth Haram) together with Beth-nimrah, is ſaid to have been built by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather becauſe in Joſhua it is called Beth-Haram) ſome take to be Betaramptha (of which * Joſephus) after by Herod called Julias. But whether this Betaramptha were corrupted from Beth-Haram, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Aramatha there is mention in ‖ Joſephus) or from Beth-Remphan (of which Remphan, an Idol of thoſe Countries, we read Act. 7. 43. and to which Junius refers the name of the City Rephan, 1. Macch. 37.) of this queſtion it were hard to reſolve. But touching Julias (according to Joſephus ſometimes Betaramptha) the ſame Joſephus placeth it in the Region of Peræa, beyond Jordan, which Regio Peræa, as the Greek word ſignifieth, is no more than Regio ulterior, the Country beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to ſet down the bounds of this Peræa take more pains than needs. Fourteen Villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to Joſephus. He makes it to have been built by Herod Antipas, and named Julias in honour of the adoption of Livia, Auguſtus his Wife, into the Julian Family: by which adoption ſhe was called Julia. Another Julias, he ſaith, was built by Philip the Brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which he ſaith is the ſame as Bethſaida.

Upon the Sea of Galilee near to Julias in Peræa (that is, in the Region over Jordan) they find Vetezobra, as it is called in Joſephus, for Beth-ezob, which is as much as domus hyſſopi. Of a noble Woman of this City, which for ſafeguard in the time of War with the Romans, came with many others in Hieruſalem, and was there beſieged, Joſephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable Hiſtory; how for Hunger ſhe eat her own Child, with other Tragical accidents hereupon enſuing.

Joſep. de Bell. Jud. l. 7. c. 8.

Of Succoth (which we ſaid Joſ. 13. is placed with Beth-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon) it is plain by the Story of Gedeon that it is near unto Jordan: where it is ſaid, that as he was paſt Jordan with his three Hundred, weary in the purſuit of Zebah and Salmunach, he requeſted relief of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gedeons return were by him tortured, as it ſeems under a threſhing-Carr or Tribulum, between which and their fleſh he put Thorns to tear their fleſh as they were preſt and trod under the Tribulum, and after which ſort alſo David uſed ſome of the Ammonites, though not with Thorns, but with the Iron Teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which ſignifieth ſuch Tabernacles as were made in haſt, either for Men or Cattle, Moſes Gen. 33. 17. witneſſeth, that the Original of the name was from ſuch Harbours, which Jacob in his return from Meſopotamia built in that place: As alſo the place beyond the Red-Sea, where the Children of Iſrael, as they came from Rameſes in Ægypt, had their firſt Station, was upon like reaſon called Succoth: becauſe there they ſet up their firſt Tabernacles or Tents: which they uſed after for forty years in the Wilderneſs. In remembrance whereof, the Feaſt of Succoth or Tabernacles was inſtituted.

Other four Cities of Gad are named Joſ. 21. 38. Ramoth in Gilehad, Machanaijm, Chesbon, and Jahzer, all of them by the Gadites given to the Levites; of which Jahzer, as Chesbon or Hesbon was a chief City of Sehon, whence Num. 32. 1. his Country is called the Land of Jahzer. It was taken by Moſes, having firſt ſent Spies to view it. In the firſt of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilehad. In the latter times (as it may be gathered by the propheſy of Eſay, touching Moab) it was poſſeſſed by the Moabites: to which place of Eſay alſo Hieremy in a like propheſy alludes. It was at length regained (but as it ſeems from the Ammonites) by Judas Machabæus: as it is 1 Mac. 5. 8. where Junius out of Joſephus reads Jahzer, though the Greeks hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Joſhua Joshua 16. 3. & 8. and Jud. 1. 29.) was far from these Countreys of Sehon, seated in the West Border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, until Solomon's Time; for whom the King of Ægypt wan it from the Canaanite, and gave it him as a Dowry with his Daughter.

Of Chesbon it may be marvelled, that in the place of Joshua, and 1 Chron. 6. 81. it should be said to have been given to the Levites, by the Gadites, seeing Joshua 13. v. 17. it is reckoned for a principal City of the Reubenites. Adrichomius, and such as little trouble themselves with such Scruples, finding Casbon, 1 Macc. 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilehad, taken by Judas Macchabæus, makes two Cities of one; as if this Casbon had been the Chesbon of Gad, and that of Reuben distinct from it; but the better Reconciliation is, That it being a bordering City, between Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gave their part to the Levites: For so also it seemeth, that in like reason, Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another, given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaiim, which word signifieth a double Army, we read Genesis 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Host, or Company, to joyn with him for his defence; as also Luke 2. 13. we read of the Multitude of the Host of Heaven, which appeared to the Shepherds, at the time of our Saviour's Birth; and so unto the Godly King Oswald of Northumberland, when he was soon after to joyn Battel with the Pagan Penda of Middle-England. Beda reports, that the like Comfort appeared; whence the Field where the Battel was fought in the North parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this City of Machanaiim, David abode during the Rebellion of Absalom; and the same, for the Strength thereof, Abner chose for the Seat of Ishboseth, during the War between David and the House of Saul.

Of the fourth Town, which was Ramoth in Gilehad, we read often in the Scripture; for the recovering of which King Achab lost his Life. Junius thinks, that Ramatha-Mitspæ, of which Joshua 13. 26. was this Ramoth in Gilehad. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilehad, which is as much as a witnessing Heap, because of the Heap of Stones which Laban and his Sons left for a Monument; so also that it was called Mitspah, which signifieth Over-looking (because there they called God to over-see, and be Witness to their Covenant) it is plain by the place, Gen. 31. 49. that in these parts there was not only a Town, but likewise a Region called Mitspa, it appears Jos. 11. 3. where we read of the Chivites under Hermon, in the Country of Mitspa * the Town of Mitspa, as it seems both by this place and in the eighth verse following, being not in the Hill Country, but in the Valley. But seeing that Jephthah the Judge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob (whither his Brethren had driven him) dwelt in this Town of Mitspa, who doubtless was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his Brethren; it may seem that they do not well which place this Town of Mitspa rather in Gad, than in Manasse. By Judas Macchabæus this Town of Mitspa (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burnt, and all the Males of it was slain: for it was then possest of the Ammonites.

* Of other towns of this name, See in the Tribe of Benjamin.

Jud. 11. 36.

1 Macc. 5. 35.

Between Succoth (of which we have spoken) and the River Jaboc was that Peniel or Penuel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei; A place where the face of God was seen: so called for Memory of the Angel's appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishness of which City, in refusing to relieve Gedeon, was the cause that in his return he over-threw their Tower, and slew the chief Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, they add Rogelim, the City of that great and faithful Subject Barzillai, as it seems, not far from Mahanaima, where he sustained King David during Absaloms Rebellion. To these they add the Towns of Gaddi, Arnon, and Alimis, of which Gaddi being in Hebrew no more then Gaddita, is ignorantly made a name of a place. Arnon also no where appears to be the name of a Town, but still of a River. Alimis Adrichomius frames of ἐν Ἀλίμοις, 1 Macc. 5. 26. so that the name should rather be Alema; but Junius out of Josephus reads Mallæ, for this in Alimis: And understanding Mallæ to be put for Millo, and to be as much as Munitio (as we have shewed touching the Millo of the Sichemites) he takes this Mallæ to be Mitspa Moabitarum, of which 1 Sam. 22. 3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius finds in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacath, which Moses noteth to be as far as the fartheſt of Manasses, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 Macc. 5. 10. (which Junius takes to be * Rithma, of which Num. 33. 18. a place of strength in the Territory of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith and Abel vinearum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Jephthah's pursuit of the Ammonites: seated as it seems by that place of the book of Judges, the former of them in the South-Border, and the other in the East border, both far removed from the Gadites. But the chief City of the Ammonites was nearer, and not far from the Borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometime Rabbath as Deut. 3. 11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that ‖ Philadelphia which Ptolomy finds in Cœlosyria. Hierom and Callistus in Arabia. It was Conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it seems never possest by the Israelites, after the overthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites; whereupon at length it became the Regal seat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummims: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickedness infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his ancestors: who having been first beaten by the Assyrians, and their Assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Seir had been) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumæans. Yet did the Races of Emoreus, of whom these Gyants were descended, contend with the Conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hesbon had dispossest Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and between them recovered the best part of all the Valley, between the Mountains and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or the other of these two, Moses and Israel found all those Cities and Countreys, which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. years since that these Zamzummims or Raphaims were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but having these two Kings of one kindred, and both Valiant and undertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon both Ammorites, they

At the firſt Aſſault thereof Urias was ſhot to Death, having been by direction from David, appointed to be employed in the leading of an Aſſault, where he could not eſcape: wherein alſo many of the beſt of the Army periſhed, and wherein David ſo diſpleaſed God, as his Affairs had ill Succeſs afterward even to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich Crown of Gold, which the Kings of Ammon wore; or which, as ſome expound it, was uſed to be ſet on the Head of their Idol, weighing a Talent, which is ſixty pound weight after the common Talent. In the time of Chriſtians it had a Metropolitan Biſhop, and under him twelve others.

Of the Ammonites, part of whoſe Territories the Gadites won from Og the King of Baſan.

THis Tribe of Gad, poſſeſt half the Country of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petræa called Nabathea, as well within as without the Mountains of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites won it, it was in the poſſeſſion of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moſes did not expel the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thruſt the Iſſues of Lot over the Mountains Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the firſt Judge of Iſrael; the Ammonites joyned with the Moabites againſt the Hebrews, and ſo continued long. Jephtha Judge of Iſrael had a great Conqueſt over one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them again. Jud. 10.

Afterward we find that cruel King of the Ammonites, called Nahas: who beſieging Jabes Gilead, gave them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right Eyes. The reaſon why he tendred ſo hard a Compoſition, was (beſides this deſire to bring ſhame upon Iſrael) becauſe thoſe Gileadites uſing to carry a Target on their left Arms, which could not but ſhadow their left Eyes, ſhould by loſing their right, be utterly diſabled to defend themſelves: but Saul came to their Reſcue, and delivered them from that danger. This Nahas, as it may ſeem, became the Confederate of David, having friended him in Saul's time, though Joſephus thinks that this Nahas was ſlain in the Battel, when Saul raiſed the Siege of Jabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name. 1 Sam. 11. Joſeph. l. 6. Ant. c. 5. &c.

Hanon ſucceeded Nahas; to whom when David ſent to congratulate his Eſtabliſhment, and to confirm the former friendſhip which he had with his Father, he moſt contemptuouſly and proudly cut off the Ambaſſadors garments to the knees, and ſhaved the half of their Beards. But afterward notwithſtanding the Aids received from the Aramites Subject to Adadezer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from Iſtob, yet all thoſe Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were over-turned: their chief City of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken, the Crown which weighed a Talent of Gold was ſet on Davids head, all ſuch as were Priſoners David executed with ſtrange ſeverity, for with Saws and Harrows, he tare them in peices, and caſt the reſt into Lime-kilns. 2 Sam. 10. 4. 18. Iſtob, that is the men of Thob: Thob is a ſmall Territory under Aram hills. Rehob is another between Hazor and Sidon, in the North-bound of Canaan, Num. 13. 22. of which ſee in the Tribe of Aſſer.

Joſaphat Governing Juda, they aſſiſted the Moabites their Neighbours againſt him, and periſhed together. Oſias made them Tributaries, and they were again by Jotham inforc't to continue that tribute, and to increaſe it, to wit, an hundred Talents of Silver, ten thouſand meaſures of Wheat, and ten thouſand of Barley: which the Ammonites continued two years. Hier. 40. and 41. 2 Chron. 20. 2 Chron. 36. 2 Chron. 26. 2 Chron. 27.

Desart: and all these other Provinces before named with Peræa and Ituræa, he nameth but as part of Cœlosyria, as far South as Rabba or Philadelphia; likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad and Reuben, saving the Land near the Dead Sea, he makes part of a Arabia Petræa: For many of these small Kingdoms take not much more Ground than the County of Kent.

Basan, or after the Septuagint, Basanitis, stretcheth it self from the River of Jaboc, to the (a) Machati and Gessuri; and from the Mountains to Jordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattel. It had also the goodliest Woods of all that part of the World; especially of Oaks, which bear Mast, (of which the Prophet Zacharias, Howl, O ye Oaks of Bashan) and by reason hereof they bred so many Swine, as (b) 2000 in one Herd were carried head-long into the Sea, by the unclean Spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it threescore Cities, walled and defenced: All which, after Og and his Sons were slain, Jair, descended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Country after his own Name, Avoth Jair, or the Cities of Jair.

(a) So they call them of Mabacath, of which Mabacath some what hath been spoken toward the end of the fifth Paragraph of this Chap. See 1 Mac. 5. 36. and Deut. 3. 14. and Jos. 12. 5.
(b) Mark 5. 13.
